Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it seems doubtful whether or not domestic servants are included in the bill. The author of the bill, the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], in replying to a question that I asked him, was not sure, but rather thought that they were included. Let me call the attention of the committee to the paragraph at the bottom of page 5, in section 8:

Every employer shall keep a register of the names of the women and minors employed by him in any occupation in the District of Columbia, of the hours worked by each, and of all payments made to each, whether paid by the time or by the piece.

Now, it would be an utter absurdity, and I think the gentleman from Colorado will realize it——

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there for a suggestion?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; with pleasure.

Mr. KEATING. It is possible we might answer the gentleman's objection by inserting "any employer who employs more than a certain number," so far as this registration is concerned.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That would obviate this particular difficulty; but I myself would prefer that domestic servants should not be included in such a bill as this, and I rather think the gentleman from Colorado himself does not intend that they should be included. I gathered from the remarks he made this morning that they have not been included in the laws passed by the various States. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] pointed out, this sort of legislation is designed to get at a condition brought about by the great development of factories and the very large increase in the employment of women in production of various sorts; to deal with large masses of people, as he suggested. I do not think legislation of this sort ought to include the question of employment of female servants. The gentleman has suggested that a definite number should be stated as required in the registry.

Mr. KEATING. Let me call the gentleman's attention to the language. Let us see if it works a hardship. I do not desire to work any hardship on employers, and I do not think anybody interested in the bill so desires. The language is:

Every employer shall keep a registry of the names of the women and minors employed by him in any occupation in the District of Columbia.

Mr. LONGWORTH. So far I am entirely with the gentleman as to the employer of a large number of female employees.

Mr. KEATING. Suppose you had but one employee. Would there be any hardship in keeping a registry of that one employee?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Not of itself. But how would it be possible for any man or woman to return the number of servants employed and the hours of work performed each day? You can not pay them by the day or piece. It is a physical impossibility.

Mr. KEATING. I do not see that that would be a serious objection. If there is an insuperable obstacle, I would like to have that pointed out.

Mr. HELM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. HELM. How would this affect the Willard Hotel or the Raleigh?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Unquestionably the Willard Hotel or the Raleigh would have to keep a register of the number of women employees and the number of hours they worked; or any one of us who has a house here and employed female servants, one or more, would have to make a return every year, stating the number of hours that each one of those had worked every day.

Mr. HELM. Does not the gentleman think that an establishment like the Willard or the Raleigh, or any other hotel that employs a great number of housekeepers, ought to do something to show what they are paid? I am told that they are a very poor class of labor that is underpaid.

Mr. LONGWORTH. It may be. And it may be that the Congress does not pay the scrub women in the House Office Building a sufficient wage. But under this bill I doubt very much whether this House would not have to register and make a return of the number of scrub women employed in that House Office Building and the number of hours they worked each day.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If this bill is designed to correct a great injustice, it ought to reach individuals as quickly and as efficiently as it does the masses, should it not? And if that is true, then this register should be kept whether one person is employed or a thousand. Otherwise the bill denies its own philosophy.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I certainly do not believe that Congress ought to pass such legislation. I do not think any supporter of the principle of the minimum wage as applied to women would advocate the proposition that every householder or renter of apartments in the District of Columbia should make a return giving the names and the number of female help and the number of hours employed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman understands, does he not, that the employer is not required to make a return unless he is requested so to do by the board?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I did not understand that.

Mr. MAPES. Yes; that is true.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The provision is—

Every employer shall keep a register of the names of the women and minors employed by him in any occupation in the District of Columbia, of the hours worked by each, and of all payments made to each, whether paid by the time or by the piece.

The rest is on request.

Mr. MAPES. And on request make an accounting to the board.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; but he must keep the register without request.

Mr. KEATING. I hope the House will not adopt the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. In the first place, let me reiterate what I said this morning. There is no mention of domestic servants in the bill. The question of considering domestic service as a "trade" or "industry" would be one to be determined by the board.

Personally, I confess, I can not understand the argument that domestic servants should be specifically excluded from operations of this bill. What is the object of the bill? It is to provide a living wage for women and children. I contend, as I contended in the beginning, that the man or woman who is not prepared to pay a living wage for domestic service should be compelled to perform his or her own work.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose that in most instances, or at least in many instances, domestic servants, besides getting wages, get bed and board without charge.

Mr. KEATING. Quite so.

Mr. CANNON. Which employees in many industries do not.

Mr. KEATING. And under the machinery of this bill all those things will be taken into consideration. To my mind that is one of the very best features of the bill. Instead of attempting to make a flat minimum wage to apply to all industries, the bill provides that each calling shall be taken up by itself, and that all the conditions surrounding that calling shall be considered, just as the gentleman from Illinois very properly suggests. The fact that a domestic servant is provided with room and board and perhaps other necessaries should be considered.

Mr. CANNON. Will my colleague allow me to make another suggestion?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. My understanding is that in many department stores the luncheon comes free, while in others it does not. Would that be taken into consideration?

Mr. KEATING. Everything in connection with the employment would be taken into consideration.

Mr. CANNON. So that you would be required to have as many different wages as you have department stores or families.

Mr. KEATING. The minimum wage is to be established for each calling, each industry.

Now, so far as keeping this register is concerned——

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am considering not so much the keeping of the register as the stating of the number of hours of work.

Mr. KEATING. Why can not a housewife state how many hours "Mary" works? Is it possible that "Mary" works so many hours that the housewife can not tell how long she works? Of course she can.

Mr. PADGETT. If she comes one morning at 8 o'clock and the next at 8.15 and the next at 8.20, it would require a system of bookkeeping to keep track of the time she works.

Mr. KEATING. Oh, I think gentlemen are safe in saying that the law would be construed in a reasonable fashion.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If no such amendment is made to the law, will the gentleman feel it his duty, if he maintains an establishment in Washington, to return the number of servants that he has and their hours?

Mr. KEATING. I would probably make an inquiry at the office of the board, and in order to be safe I would keep such a record.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Are we passing a law whose interpretation we shall have to submit to somebody else?

Mr. KEATING. Oh, no. I will say to the gentleman that similar laws, with exactly the same language as this, have been passed in 12 States of the Union, and there has been no difficulty about them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But a second wrong is never justified by the first.

Mr. KEATING. No; and there is no first wrong here. My objection is to this amendment, which expressly excludes domestic servants, on the theory that the domestic servant, for some reason, which no gentleman has advanced, is not entitled to a sufficient wage to maintain life. I maintain that the Congress of the United States should hesitate before it goes on record as favoring the proposition that all women workers are entitled to a living wage except the poor woman who enters domestic service.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. If I am the man of straw whom the gentleman is battering down, I am perfectly willing to pose temporarily in that capacity.

Mr. KEATING. Oh, no. My objection is to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] that expressly excludes domestic servants. I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] will be agreed to. As I understand it, and as I believe the gentleman stated, in none of the 11 or 12 States where they have the minimum-wage act in force does domestic service come within the term "industry."

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman pardon me just there? What I said was that so far as I knew no minimum-wage board in any State had attempted to regulate the wages of domestic servants, but in no act with which I am familiar has the attempt been made to exclude domestic servants.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield for a question again?

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has the floor.

Mr. WALSH. Even under the qualified statement of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], it seems to me it ought to be perfectly apparent that we ought not to pass an act here which may include domestic service, particularly for the District of Columbia. Now, conditions here are very much different from what they are elsewhere, as we all know. People come here and many are here only for a short time. The character of the service is different than what it is at home. The terms people make for these services are different than they make when they are at home.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. The underlying principle and theory upon which this legislation is predicated is that people are incompetent to make their own contracts?

Mr. WALSH. No; I do not think so, although I do not wonder that the gentleman might draw that conclusion from some of the arguments that have been advanced in favor of the measure. But I want to say that I think the State of Massachusetts was the first State to adopt a minimum-wage law. It was, of course, looked at with suspicion at first, and thought to be somewhat of a fad, and that it would not work out in its operation. But it has, and we have a board, I think, made up of five or seven members that has authority somewhat similar to that granted by this act. They issue their regulations, they require the posting of the regulations and a schedule of hours in various establishments, but they have not invaded the sanctity of the home. They have not required that a person who is conducting a household should have to consider matters on the same plan as one conducting a commercial establishment. You do not have to commercialize your own personal home and have to keep a book and enter the hours of labor, the rate of pay, and all the details. It seems to me that we might well defer requiring that or even permitting it to be done here in the District. We are legislating for the people of the District and we are seeking to make conditions, so far as the operation of this law goes, the same as in the States which have already adopted it. I submit that it would hardly be proper to write into the law definitions which would permit this board to say to Mrs. Brown, "I want you to keep a register and tell me how many hours Mary Smith works and how many hours your janitor works, and what you pay him; how much you have given him for food, in the way of clothing," and so forth. It seems to me you are not going to get any benefit from that, because in these enlightened days there are very few domestic servants employed anywhere but what are getting at least a living wage. A great many of them live where they are employed, and certainly they get their living; they get their clothing and they get their lodging and they get their food and whatever else they get in addition to that will be considered, of course, as a part of their wages, and it is above a living wage. That is one of the difficulties of this measure.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. FESS. A careful reading of lines 3 and 4, page 2, gives you the impression that domestic servants are included?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; or might be included.

Mr. FESS. I think there is very little doubt about it.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I want to make just an observation. Occupation is defined by this proposed measure. It has to do not with what domestic servants might be doing, but as to the business of the employer. Occupation includes business, industry, trade, or branch thereof. Now, in the section on page 5, from which there has been a quotation, are the words, "Every employer shall keep a register of the names of the women or minors employed by him in any occupation in the District of Columbia." So I take it, Mr. Chairman, that it would be unnecessary for the Congress to limit this in the manner indicated by the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, because the law itself defines the matter clearly—namely, that such employment would not come within the purview of the act.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILLIARD. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am surprised that the gentleman should be in such a disagreement with his colleague, the author of the bill, who says that occupation does mean domestic service.

Mr. HILLIARD. It is not necessary that my colleague and I should agree on all things. I do not understand, however, that Mr. KEATING says that necessarily domestic service is included in the law. The definition of occupation is made plain, and the only register that is required is of those employed in an occupation.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILLIARD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Let me direct the gentleman's attention to the words, beginning on line 3, page 2, "The term 'occupation' includes a business, industry, trade, or branch thereof." It does not say that it means business, trade, or branch thereof. It merely says that it includes; but it may include something else. Just above it says, "The term 'minor' means a person of either sex under the age of 18 years."

Mr. HILLIARD. Does the gentleman say that it is an occupation on the part of the house owner to keep house?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; if housekeeping is not an occupation I will remain quiet for a while. [Laughter.]

Mr. HILLIARD. I say that the amendment should be defeated because it is wholly unnecessary, and if it is not it ought to be defeated anyway. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KEATING) there were 24 ayes and 15 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 4, page 2, insert "The term 'cost of living' shall mean the cost of all those things necessary to maintain a worker in good health or supply him with the conditions and comforts necessary for his or her reasonable well-being, and the term 'minimum wage' shall mean a wage sufficient to pay the 'cost of living'."

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me a careful reading of the bill will show that there is nothing in it from which you can gather what is intended by the terms "cost of living" and "minimum wage." I simply attempt to define these terms so we may know just what we mean by their use. I notice that the Minnesota minimum-wage law defines these terms, and I think properly so. It seems to me that in drawing a statute of this kind we ought to give the commission that is to act under it something to go by; a definition which they can follow. Otherwise, I can not help but feel that the commission in fixing a minimum wage or finding the cost of living is up in the air. It can guess that a minimum wage is one thing or it can guess that it is something else. It can guess that the cost of living is one thing or something else. We ought to have a rule by which the commission can be guided in making its determinations.

Mr. WALSH. Would not the adoption of the gentleman's definition give them a standard by which they could apply the rules to the different lines of industry, whereas without that, they might have a different standard for each?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. That is what I aim to do. I also aim to eliminate the objectionable words that have been called to the attention of the committee, words that may be construed to reflect upon women workers as immoral. It is undoubtedly true that an inadequate wage tends to force women into immoral lives, but it is not necessary to put that into the statute. We ought to prescribe these standards and eliminate the objectionable words. I think it unnecessary to put into the statute any language that may tend to reflect on the women workers, and hope this amendment may be adopted.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, while I have great respect for the mover of the amendment, yet I doubt its wisdom. This thing of regulating what you shall eat and what you shall wear, that the strong shall become as the weak, whether you are the first cousin of an idiot, or are old and senile, or young and vigorous, creates perplexing conditions; and yet under universal law that governs matter we have had all kinds of people and will continue to have. We are pretty well fixed in this country. Every fellow takes care of himself, and when he gets married of his wife and then of his children. He cares for the household. Some of them have hog and hominy. Some people like hog and hominy better than they do ice cream and other things of different kinds. Some people eat a great deal more than others. Some will get fat on a very small amount and some will get lean although they have many times as much as some other people. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE] has just asked me if I had ever read Ten Thousand a Year. Yes; I read it, and I suspect everyone has read it. Tittlebat Titmouse, by virtue of the firm of Quirk, Gammon & Snap, in fixing up litigation and forging evidence and sustaining it by perjury, won a peerage for its client Titmouse, and he became a member of the House of Lords. He introduced a bill there, and what did it provide? To this effect—

Be it enacted, etc., That everybody shall have everything.

[Laughter.]

That was his notion about it, and I am reminded now in my recollection that after he had won the peerage he once went to the house of Mr. Quirk, one of the firm that had won the lawsuit for him. Quite a number of people were there, and they began to say smart things. Presumably they had had some port and—yes, some champagne, and so forth. After a time the name of Tittlebat Titmouse was called, and he was asked what he could do in the way of poetry. He rose to the occasion all right. My recollection is that it was as follows:

Tittlebat Titmouse is my name,
England is my nation;
London is my dwelling place,
And Christ is my salvation!

That is the kind of a fellow that Tittlebat was, who wanted to pass a law that everybody should have everything. You know there are some people in this world to-day who think that all you have to do to remedy some condition that they happen to have rise to plague them is to pass a law—be it enacted, and so forth.

Oh, let us be serious for a moment. He that reaps, being normal, must sow. If everyone is to have a divide in this world, then there will not be much of effort. There might be something of starvation, and ten times more than there is now. If I had my way about it, every normal individual should make his own living. When I say normal, I mean normal, for I believe that every abnormal individual, if he be a thief, should be supported in the penitentiary, upon conviction, or in the county jail. You may talk about all men being born equal politically, entitled to be equal before the law, but we are not equal in other ways. I still think, on the average, we will support the abnormal and the poor and the unfortunate, those who can not make their way, whether it be because of physical disqualification or mental disqualification. In this country we care for the insane and the feeble-minded perhaps better than they do in any other country on earth. Marvelous improvement has been made in the way in which we take care of the insane and the feeble-minded. They are entitled how to care and to support from the Treasury. Each normal individual must care for himself and only the abnormal become a public charge.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 16, noes 17.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, are there enough here to get tellers if the demand is made? Oh, well, I shall not make the demand.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In reading over the bill I see that in drafting the bill the gentleman has followed the Oregon law somewhat, and I want to call his attention to the definition of the term "minor." As I understand it, the Oregon law has the same provision with regard to the use of the word "minor" that the gentleman has employed in this bill; but in the District of Columbia we have a law, if I remember correctly, fixing the legal age at which one may make a contract at 21 years. Now, here we are saying that the term "minor" means a person of either sex under 18 years of age. I would like to ask the gentleman if it would not be better to change the word "minor" here, if it is desired to leave the term at 18, to the word "child" or "young person," and then change it subsequently through the bill. Otherwise, we will have two laws in the District defining a minor, one fixing the age at 18 and the other at 21 years.

Mr. HILLIARD. If the gentleman will yield for a moment, it is limited to this act.

Mr. GOOD. I know it is; but here you have a person aged 18. He is a minor when it comes to a contract, and yet he is not a minor under the terms of this law. It seems to me that we can use another word or term and obviate that confusion. I do not know in how many places it appears in the bill, but it seems to me we should avoid the confusion.

Mr. HILLIARD. It seems to me we could hardly choose a better word; I do not know what would be better language.

Mr. GOOD. We have already defined in the District what a minor is. Now, you have a person employed in one of the stores 19 years of age. He is not a minor under the terms of this bill, yet when he comes to make a contract under the laws of the District he is a minor.

Mr. HILLIARD. It is a fact we must define him here, and he is a minor at 18 for the purposes of this act. We had to define him.

Mr. GOOD. I see the suggestion of the gentleman, but why not use the word "child" instead of the word "minor"?

Mr. HILLIARD. I do not think that would be a good word.

Mr. GOOD. Why not?

Mr. HILLIARD. A person 18 years of age does not like to be called a child. I do not think "minor" is objectionable.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, page 2, line 2, the word "eighteen" and insert the word "twenty-one."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the word "eighteen" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-one."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the argument suggested by the gentleman from Iowa is perfectly sound, and if the amendment suggested by me is adopted it will broaden the scope of those who are to come under the benefits of this act, and it would seem we ought not to call persons minors who may infringe other laws when they are 19 years of age, but when you come to apply this law if they are 18 years and 6 months they are not minors. In other words, it seems to me that people who are in all other respects and under all other statutes called minors should be so designated by this act.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. I will.

Mr. LONDON. Under the English law they have a division into children, young persons and minors. In all labor laws—I do not recall the exact age, but as far as my recollection serves—up to 15 they are designated as children, between 15 and 18 they are designated as young persons, and then as minors.

Mr. WALSH. I do not think that classification is provided in any jurisdiction in this country.

Mr. LONDON. I know it is not.

Mr. WALSH. And after they are 21 I suppose in England they are called adults; I think they are.

Mr. KEATING. Let me call attention to a provision of the bill which may possibly have some influence in determining the gentleman's conclusion. The bill provides that the wages of adult women shall be determined by a conference and that the wages of minors shall be determined by the board and not by a conference. Now, if you raise the limit to 21 years you are going, of course, to broaden the jurisdiction of the board. All minimum-wage legislation has been drafted on the theory that the board itself might be trusted with the task of investigating and fixing the wages to be paid to boys and girls under 18 years, and I think it would be rather a serious matter to raise that to 21.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit? Simply because a person should happen to be 18 years and 2 months of age, why should they be deprived of the benefits of the act which will be granted to a person who is 17 years and 10 months of age?

Mr. KEATING. Of course, I might make much the same argument against 21 years.

Mr. WALSH. No; because 21 years is universally recognized, both in Federal statutes and in the various State jurisdictions, as the age at which the person ceases to be a minor.

Mr. KEATING. But, as a matter of practice, in industry the worker ceases to be a minor when he passes 18. That is the practical experience.

Mr. WALSH. It may be as a matter of custom or practice, but not as a matter of law.

Mr. KEATING. We are not so much interested in the legal definition here, because what we are trying to get at is the solution of an industrial problem.

Mr. WALSH. Let me remind the gentleman that while the committee or the people interested in this measure may not have interest in the legal definition, when you pass this act you make a legal definition.

Mr. KEATING. So far as this act is concerned.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; and it seemed to me it would be better in this one particular at least not to set up a new class for a specific purpose and create a new standard upon passing that limit—children who in other respects would be minors, but in this act would not.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman should bear this in mind, that it happens to be a fact that in industry when women and men get above 18 years they are able to represent themselves very well, or they belong to associations or organizations that can represent them, but if below that age they would scarcely be capable of sitting around this conference table we have mentioned here and represent their interests. Now, that is the reason we have hit upon 18 years. Experience sustains the age limit of 18, and I hope it will not be changed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Massachusetts be extended one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. LONDON. Would not the expression "persons under the age of 18" cover the situation?

Mr. WALSH. Yes; it would.

Mr. LONDON. So that we would not have to put in the two lines defining the term "minor," as meaning a person of either sex under the age of 18 years. In the law, according to the very title of the bill, you will have to protect the lives and health of women and young persons, and we may have it later on that a young person means a person of either sex under the age of 18 years. I think that would be better. There is some confusion about the word "minor." In every other law a person is supposed to be a minor who is under the age of 21. I suggest the word "minor" be stricken out and we insert the words "young person" instead.

Mr. WALSH. I think if that is done you might have to make several other amendments in the bill. My object was to have the word "minor" defined as a person of either sex under the age of 21, and make it uniform.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 15.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That there is hereby created a board to be known as the minimum-wage board, to be composed of three members to be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. As far as practicable the members shall be so chosen that one will represent the interests of the employing class, one the interests of the employed class, and the third will be fair and impartial between employers and employees and work for the best interests of the public as a whole.

The commissioners shall make their first appointments hereunder within 30 days after this act takes effect, and shall designate one of the three members first appointed to hold office until January 1, 1919; one to hold office until January 1, 1920; and one to hold office until January 1, 1921. On or before the 1st day of January of each year, beginning with the year 1919, the commissioners shall appoint a member to succeed the member whose term expires on such 1st day of January, and such new appointee shall hold office for the term of three years from such 1st day of January. Each member shall hold office until his successor is appointed and has qualified; and any vacancy that may occur in the membership of the board shall be filled by appointment by the commissioners for the unexpired portion of the term.

A majority of the members shall constitute a quorum to transact business, and the act or decision of such a majority shall be deemed the act or decision of the board; and no vacancy shall impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all the powers of the board.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 2, line 9, after the word "one," strike out all to the end of the paragraph, and in lieu thereof insert the following: "will be representative of the employers, one representative of the employees, and one representing the public."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers a substitute to the amendment.

Mr. GOOD. Striking out, after the word "Columbia," all the rest of the paragraph, and inserting the following.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GOOD as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 2, line 8, after the word "Columbia," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"So far as practicable no person shall be appointed to membership on said board who is interested or partial in the determination of any question which said board is authorized to determine. No person shall be appointed on said board who represents either the employer or employed class. Said board shall work for the best interest of the public as a whole and shall be fair and impartial to both employer and employee in the solution of any question which said board must determine."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this board, if I understand the real scope of the act, will act as a sort of court of dernier resort. It must, therefore, determine the soundness of the findings of another tribunal that is called upon to make the investigation.

This board ought not to be a packed board. It ought to be a board constituted of men of open minds, men who can look at this question in a broad way, uninfluenced by the fact that one member represents the employer and the other member represents the employee, and that the third, as expressed in the bill, will be one who "will be fair and impartial."

What we ought to have here is a board that is impartial; and yet by the very terms of this law we have a packed board, one representing the employer, one representing the employee, and only the third who is described as "fair and impartial."

Now, think of a court constituted in that way. Think of a court that is to try a lawsuit, where one of the members on the bench represents the plaintiff, and another member on the bench represents the defendant, and only the third judge is to be "fair and impartial." If we are to constitute a board, for heaven's sake let it be a board in which the employer and the employee will both have confidence, in which the public will have confidence; a board that is not packed. Let these men who are interested come before the board and place before it their grievances. Let them lay before the board the things that they believe in. But let the board be a tribunal of high-minded men, having in mind the good of both the employer and the employee.

Such a board can be found. There are men here occupying high positions in the courts of the District as judges, there are many men who are here as students in the District, who, if appointed on such a board, would have in mind the importance of the questions concerning which they were called upon to determine, and such men would have in mind only the good of the public as a whole. I do not believe that Congress ought to place on the statute books of the United States a law purporting to create an impartial tribunal, but when we say in the law itself that one man must be partial to labor and one man must be partial to the employer and the third is to be fair and will measure out equal justice to both the employer and the employee we announce a rather peculiar standard. It seems to me that some program creating an impartial tribunal as that ought to be written into this bill rather than one that creates a packed tribunal.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I can not quite agree with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], and am not in favor of his substitute.

Of course, we have very many tribunals that are constituted just as it is proposed to constitute this one. That is to say, here is a board that is to deal with the compensation or wages paid to employees. Now, one member of the board is to be chosen so that he will have the views of the employer, and he will be a representative of the interests of the employer. Another will be the representative of the workers' interests, knowing what their desires and views are. The third will be one who is not allied with and has not any particular interest in either class.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? Read the language.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman says, "Read the language," which I am most happy to do. The language is:

As far as practicable, the members shall be so chosen that one will represent the interests of the employing class, one the interests of the employed class, and the third will be fair and impartial between employers and employees and work for the best interests of the public as a whole.

Now, as I interpret that, it means the third man will not represent either the employer or the employee.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman is keen at interpretation of language of this kind. What has he to say about the first? Is he to work for the interests of the public as a whole?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. GOOD. Where does the gentleman find anything that will warrant that interpretation?

Mr. WALSH. I find that from the rest of the proposed act.

Mr. GOOD. I am talking about the language now in section 2. The first person——

Mr. WALSH. Will be a representative of the employer. Now, if he is the representative of the employer, that does not preclude him from working for the public?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; but the expression of one thing is the exclusion of the other, is it not?

Mr. WALSH. No. I do not think so in the language that is used; one will represent the interests of the employing class, one the interests of the employed class, and the third will be fair and impartial between the two.

Mr. GOOD. "And work for the best interests of the public as a whole." The gentleman must concede that the other two will not "work for the best interests of the public as a whole," but one for the interests of the laboring class and the other for the interests of the employing class.

Mr. WALSH. I will agree with the gentleman thus far that the language employed is perhaps unfortunate, but I think that the principle included within the language used is all right. We make up various tribunals along that very line. The gentleman states that it would be absurd to think of a court constituted of one judge representing the plaintiff, another the defendant, and the third impartial. I have no doubt the gentleman has tried cases before courts made up just about like that. I have heard of them. But the point I am making is that while perhaps the language may not be the best that might be employed, it would seem to me that on a board of this sort the employers of labor ought to have a member who can represent their views, who knows the problems they have to contend with, and that likewise the employees should have a man who knows the problems they have to meet, and who is familiar with the conditions that confront them, and that the third man should not be a representative of either class, but that he should be somebody who could come to the consideration of these questions with a free and unbiased mind, and that he should not come with any prejudice or inclination toward the views of an employer or toward the views of an employee. But I do think that this section should be amended in this respect, that these appointments should be made by the President and not by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make one observation that I want those in charge of the bill to note. I rather think the language in lines 11, 12, and 13, on page 2, is somewhat unhappy. I am sure that what the committee wants to do is justifiable, that this board should be made up so that the two interests will be represented, and that there shall be one person who is not identified with either. The committee will recall that that was one subject of considerable controversy in the vocational-education bill when we made up that board. It was insisted that the manufacturing and commercial interests should be represented, that the laboring interests should be represented, and that the agricultural interests should be represented; and the language of the vocational bill is this:

One of said three citizens shall be a representative of the manufacturing and commercial interests, one a representative of the agricultural interests, and one a representative of the labor interests.

I think it would be better to leave out the word "class" and just let it read "a representative of the employers, another a representative of the employees, and another a representative of the public."

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, I am inclined to think he is right about that. So far as I am concerned, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] fits the situation. I think the substitute should be defeated, and I am quite willing to agree to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the substitute offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] strikes me as being somewhat afield of the main question. Of course, I should prefer that the amendment offered by myself should be considered favorably. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] carries with it the unhappy phrase which my amendment seeks to eliminate from the bill. He continues the use of the word "class," which my amendment would strike out. I might as well make the statement now that I intended to make on the original amendment. The use of the word "class" as employed in section 2, the one now under consideration, is distinctly undemocratic and un-American. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], who speaks well for the working people, and who may be said to be a representative of them in this House, indicated himself that the purpose of this section was to enable the employer and the employee to get together around the council table, so that they might better understand each other. The use of the word "class" in a labor bill is most unfortunate and would not contribute in the slightest to bringing the employer and employee together around the council table, but would tend to perpetuate unfriendly relations that have been handed down from the days of the barons.

Mr. KEATING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEATING. Again I find myself in complete accord with the gentleman from Pennsylvania as to class distinctions; but will the gentleman permit me to say that the language of which he complains is the exact language of the Oregon law, and that is how it happened to get into this bill. As the gentleman has offered an amendment which is better phrased, I think we should get together and adopt it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Then in the remainder of my time I will ask that my amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania: Page 2, line 9, after the word "one," strike out all to the end of the paragraph and in lieu thereof insert the following: "will be representative of the employers, one representative of the employees, and one representing the public."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I would urge that the Good substitute be voted down and this amendment be voted up.

Mr. KEATING. Would it not be well to strike out the word "the" before the word "employers" and before the word "employees" so that it will read "shall represent employers and employees"?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That would be all right.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman let me make another suggestion? In one place you use the word "representative" and in another you use the word "representing."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I used the word "representing" because the language of my amendment covers the language on page 7, in the body of the bill, where the word "class" is stricken out. In the body of the bill it says:

The conference shall be composed of not more than three representatives of the employers in such occupation, of an equal number of representatives of the employees in such occupation, of not more than three disinterested persons representing the public, and of one or more members of the board.

I followed that language in the amendment.

Mr. FESS. I think it would be better to say "one representing the employers and one representing the employees and one representing the public."

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. We are dealing with it in the plural.

Mr. FESS. It is immaterial, however.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania desire to modify his amendment?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Colorado suggested that we strike out the word "the."

Mr. KEATING. What I feared was that, as the amendment stood, it might refer to the employers who are engaged in the particular industry under investigation. The idea of the bill is to permit employers to sit and have a representation on the board.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment by striking out the word "the" before the word "employers," and by striking out the word "the" before the word "employees."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as modified by the suggestion of the gentleman from Colorado, I want to say that both the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Colorado fail to understand the value of this section. It is the object of this section and of the Oregon bill to create a board which is to consist of an advocate of the interests of the employees, of an advocate in the interest of the employers, and of a representative of the public. The three members of the board are not to be impartial judges. Industrial disputes can not be settled by courts. In all these boards of negotiation and boards of arbitration of industry the members of the board try to reach unanimous decisions. The very first moment that their decisions are not unanimous they cease to be useful. It is the intention of the law, it is the intention of all legislative dealings with boards of negotiation and boards of arbitration in industry, to create an institution in which the laboring man can have an advocate, a lawyer, to represent him; a man who is bound to represent his interests; and the same thing is true about the employer. The employer is to have a representative of the employer's interests, and that is why the Oregon statute speaks distinctly of the representative of the employer's class. In other words, the man who represents the employer is not to speak in behalf of humanity, of universal truth, justice, and beauty; he is to represent the temporal and material interests of the employer. It is only when the two conflicting interests are represented that the truth can be ascertained and the facts found. The third person, the representative of the public, is to aid in reaching a unanimous decision. If you examine the records of the boards of arbtration, you will find that the very first moment the board had ceased to render unanimous decisions its usefulness was gone. They can only reach a unanimous decision when the representative of the employers looks upon himself as the representative of certain interests which he is to defend, which he is to represent; and the same thing should be true about the representative of labor.

The language of the Oregon statute repeated here should be retained. The language of the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not, in the least, improve it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. The board is to be a permanent board; it is to sit indefinitely, as it were?

Mr. LONDON. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. One member is to be a representative of employers and therefore——

Mr. LONDON. If the gentleman will permit, "a representative of the employers" is a meaningless expression, representative in what sense?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That he has been of the employers, and he knows their side generally, and is in sympathy with the employers. If you do not use that term and say "representing the interests," then you put an interested party in the position of being a mediator on this board.

Mr. LONDON. There is where the gentleman is mistaken. He is not there as a mediator, he is there as a negotiator.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. That is the way he ought to be there. I think the gentleman misunderstands the purpose of the amendment. We are to have a permanent board of three, one a representative of employers generally, one a representative of employees generally, and one representing the public.

Mr. LONDON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania speaks of one as though he were to be the representative of the psychology of the employer. That is not the intention of the bill. We do not want one who is the representative of the psychology of the employer, who has the prejudices of the employer. We want one who is there to represent the material interests of the employer.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is just the same as if we said one "who is versed in the law." We want one on the board who knows something about the employer's side generally and one on the board who represents the views of the employee generally. The third one is the representative of the public.

Mr. LONDON. It is not sufficient that the representative of the employers should represent the employers' psychology. He must know the particular material interests of the employers at that particular moment.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Yes; but the evidence is to be brought up to the three sitting as a board.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: On page 2, line 7, strike out the words "the Commissioners of the District of Columbia" and substitute the words "the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 7, strike out the words "the Commissioners of the District of Columbia" and insert in lieu thereof the words "the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this is a rather important amendment, and out of respect to the Chief Executive, upon whom it is intended to confer this additional authority, I think we should have more Members present. I therefore make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 12098 and had come to no resolution thereon.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on to-morrow the House take up for consideration the water-power bill (S. 1419), that the same be made the continuing order, subject to business in order on Calendar Wednesday and unanimous-consent day, and to all conference reports, appropriation bills, and other privileged matters, to continue until the bill is finally passed, and that the amendment to the Senate bill be considered as a House bill, subject to amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that to-morrow there shall be taken up for consideration the water-power bill; that the amendment reported from the House committee shall be considered as the bill itself; and that it shall be the continuing order, not to interfere with business in order on Calendar Wednesday or unanimous-consent day, nor to interfere with conference reports or any other privileged matters. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have been asked by a number of Members to inquire whether the gentleman intends to press this bill to a vote before Friday?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the bill is to be considered in Committee of the Whole, and I think it ought to be considered thoroughly. I do not believe it could possibly come to a vote by Friday.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. There are some gentlemen who were under the impression that the recess would take place who would like to be here by Friday to vote on the bill.

Mr. SIMS. There will be.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. And no attempt to limit debate on the bill?

Mr. SIMS. Not at this time.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. It is fair to say it will run one or two days?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Two days?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, of course there are very few here now, and when the request was made this morning objection was made. It would seem as though this is hardly the time to make that request, with just a mere handful present, particularly when objection was made earlier in the day. Could not the gentleman make that request in the morning? It is necessary to have a quorum here in order to consider it.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say to the gentleman that I spoke to the gentleman who objected to the request this morning and told him that I was going to make the same request again this afternoon, and those who objected this morning could be here now and are not here, and therefore I do not think they really care to make any further objection.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I do not know, if the gentleman has conferred with those gentlemen——

Mr. SIMS. I went to one of them and said that I wanted to make the request again but did not want to take advantage of him. If he had any real objection to the request being made this afternoon, I think he would be here now or would have requested me not to make it.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, I know the great expedition with which this bill must be passed and how it has been pressed and urged and how nearly vital the bill has become, but I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wisconsin rise?

Mr. CARY. I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill we have had up to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to speak for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Mr. Speaker, on last Saturday when the Agricultural appropriation bill was being considered in the House, by reason of a previous engagement I was at that hour engaged upon a very important matter at one of the departments in the city and had not the privilege of being present. I felt very keenly that the price upon which the difference occurred between the conferees of the Senate and the House of $2.50 a bushel for wheat was not an excessive price in view of the increase in the cost of its production by reason of the high price of labor, increased cost of machinery, and every article used in that connection. I am sorry to have missed the opportunity to vote for the motion of the gentlemen from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] to accede to the Senate provision with an amendment for the price of $2.40 a bushel. Had I been present I should have voted for that motion.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 3009. An act granting the consent of Congress to the P. M. C. Coal Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across Tug River, connecting Pike County, Ky., and Mingo County, W. Va.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HILLIARD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, July 9, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, submitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the Navy Department (H. Doc. No. 1219), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. BROWNE: A bill (H. R. 12699) granting a pension to James Warren; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DENTON: A bill (H. R. 12700) granting an increase of pension to Mary L. Nevill; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SCOTT of Michigan: A bill (H. R. 12701) granting an increase of pension to Henry C. Swafford; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: Petition of the Women's Club of Kenosha, Wis., asking for the enactment of bone-dry prohibition legislation; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of W. P. Morrison, Port Henry, N. Y., favoring war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Presbyterian Church of Brasher Falls, N. Y., favoring war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 9, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we pray for such measure of Thy grace and truth as that every action taken by this Senate may be justified by the test of time, that we may feel that we are working together with God, that we are building not only a great empire in this West but an eternal habitation wherein dwelleth righteousness and peace and truth. We pray Thee to fit us for the high and holy obligations of this office and of this Senate. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LIST OF CASES (S. DOC. NO. 263).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a list of cases dismissed by the court on May 7, 1918, on motion of the defendants, for want of prosecution, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. HARDY, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Mr. EDMONDS, and Mr. HADLEY managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 3009) granting the consent of Congress to the P. M. C. Coal Co. to construct and maintain a bridge across Tug River, connecting Pike County, Ky., and Mingo County, W. Va., and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

CONTROL OF TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. MYERS presented a telegram in the nature of a memorial from sundry employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., of Helena, Mont., and a telegram in the nature of a memorial from sundry employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., of Billings, Mont., remonstrating against Government control of telegraph lines, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURTIS (for Mr. GOFF):

A bill (S. 4812) granting an increase of pension to Amos C. Scott; and

A bill (S. 4813) granting an increase of pension to Lizzie Dovener (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BECKHAM:

A bill (S. 4814) granting a pension to Charles W. Vogler;

A bill (S. 4815) granting an increase of pension to William W. Ferguson; and

A bill (S. 4816) granting a pension to John C. Anderson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MYERS:

A bill (S. 4817) granting a pension to David W. Beaver; to the Committee on Pensions.

DATA RELATIVE TO MILK PRODUCTS.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 282), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the United States Food Administration be directed to furnish to the Senate the following information:

1. What steps it has taken to fix or regulate the prices for the products of the milk condensaries of the United States.
2. What steps it has taken to fix or regulate the prices to be paid by the condensaries to the milk producers for their milk.
3. What action has been taken by the condensaries with the knowledge or approval of the United States Food Administration, to fix or control the prices of their products or the profits they shall make during the war.
4. If no steps have been taken by the United States Food Administration to regulate or control the prices charged or the profits made by the condensaries, why such action has not been taken.
5. What steps have been taken to ascertain whether the prices paid the milk producers is ample to pay the cost of production; and if no such steps have been taken, why it has not been done.

CHARTER RATES AND FREIGHT RATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. NELSON conferees on the part of the Senate.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no further morning business, the morning business is closed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Henderson	Nelson	Sherman
Bankhead	Hitchcock	New	Shields
Beckham	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Smith, Ariz.
Benet	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Smith, Md.
Colt	Kendrick	Penrose	Smoot
Culberson	Kenyon	Phelan	Sterling
Curtis	King	Pittman	Sutherland
Fernald	Knox	Poindexter	Swanson
Fletcher	Lewis	Reed	Thomas
France	McCumber	Saulsbury	Trammell
Gerry	McKellar	Shafroth	Vardaman
Harding	Martin	Sheppard	Walsh

Mr. BECKHAM. My colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] are detained on official business.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I desire to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is detained on official business. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I desire to state that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] are engaged in a meeting of the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I be permitted to supplement the announcement of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] to say that the committee desire also not to be sent for unless there be some urgency, and that they prefer to sit until the present matter which they have before them is concluded, which may be in a couple of hours? I desire to have the President of the Senate send any message to them should anything arise in the Senate of sufficient importance to bring them here.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator asks that the committee be authorized to sit during the session of the Senate?

Mr. LEWIS. To-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that they have been given that authority.

Mr. LEWIS. I did not know that, Mr. President. I thank the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-two Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

MILITARY SERVICE OF BRITISH AND CANADIAN SUBJECTS.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations to a circumstance that came under my observation.

A British subject in my own employ received a notice within the last few days to appear before the British recruiting office, giving him the opportunity to enlist, according to the notice, in either the British or the Canadian Army. The matter was by him referred to me. I inquired and ascertained, so far as I was able, that there has been no ratification of the treaty recently entered into between the United States and the Government of Great Britain, and that even after ratification there are allowed 60 days, if I am correctly informed, within which it is possible for a British subject to avoid enlistment in either the British or the Canadian Army and to enlist in the Army of the United States.

This particular person expressed a preference for service in the Army of the United States, in which I encouraged him, because, as he stated, his object after service is to return to the United States and to enjoy the benefit of our Army act. Furthermore, it means a replenishment of our man power after the war.

The purpose of my rising now is to ascertain whether I am correctly informed, so far as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations can advise me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator from California is substantially correct. Until the exchange of ratifications occurs between the United States and Great Britain the matter is as it has been heretofore. After that exchange of ratifications any British subject in the United States between the ages of 20 and 44 years, both inclusive, has 60 days within which to decide whether he will proceed to Great Britain or to Canada and enlist voluntarily in the Canadian or British Army, and if he fails during that 60 days to exercise his privilege, he then becomes subject to be drafted into the Army of the United States.

At the present time he is subject neither to draft in the American Army nor is he forced to decide the question at all. A man less than 20 years of age has 30 days to decide after becoming 20 years of age.

Mr. PHELAN. I understand, then, that if he does not decide within the 60 days after an exchange of ratifications he is subject to draft in the country of his present residence; that is, the United States.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is correct.

Mr. PHELAN. I am very glad that this matter has been elucidated, because I think it is valuable public information. Doubtless there are many others besides the particular person to whom I refer who are in doubt as to the effect of the treaty recently entered into between the two high contracting parties, and by the dissemination of this information such a person may be able to exercise—which would be perfectly, I am sure, in harmony with the great purposes of the war—his right to enlist in the American Army, and thus after the war be in a position to return to this country with the American Army and possibly take up the duties of American citizenship and be an accession of man power to the United States.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 11945.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 5, after the word "stock," to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$7,500"; in line 8, after "$10,000," to strike out "field supervision of war-garden work, $7,500"; and in line 22, after the words "in all," to strike out "$811,300" and insert "$721,300," so as to make the clause read:

Third. For the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture, and the conservation and utilization of plant products; for the following stated purposes and in amounts as follows: Cereal-smut eradication, $50,000; peanut conservation and utilization, $15,000; control of cotton, truck, and forage-crop diseases, $117,550; farm storage of sweet potatoes, $30,000; location of Irish-potato seed stock, $7,500; plant-disease survey, $23,000; castor-bean production and utilization, $20,000; maintenance of field-bean seed supply, $10,000; production of cereals and grain sorghums, $53,250; sugar-beet nematode work, $10,000; pathological inspection of fruits during processes of marketing, $18,000; control of a new sugar-cane disease, $20,000; production of rice, $5,000; control of cereal and forage insects, $55,000; control of stored-product insects, $22,000; control of vegetable and truck-crop insects, $35,000; control of sweet-potato weevil, $30,000; control of deciduous-fruit insects, $45,000; control of citrus-fruit insects, $10,000; control of insects injurious to live stock, $20,000; control of rice insects, $3,000; control of sugar-cane insects, $9,000; general supervision of emergency insect-control work, $3,000; prevention of plant-dust explosions and fires, $75,000; fruit and vegetable utilization, $35,000; in all, $721,300.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 25, after the word "food," to insert "including eatable nuts," so as to read:

Fourth. For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food, including eatable nuts, by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents and others; for the following stated purposes and in amounts as follows: General administration of extension work, $35,000; home-economics work, $25,000; extension work in the Northern and Western States, $134,200; county-agent work, $1,893,000; boys' and girls' club work, $382,900; home-demonstration work, $1,327,400; extension work in the Southern States, $90,000; county-agent work, $1,333,815; boys' club work, $75,300; home-demonstration work, $803,385; in all, $6,100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 11, after "$6,100,000," to strike out:

No part of this appropriation shall be available for any purpose unless there shall have been previously issued the proclamation authorized by section 15 of the act of August 10, 1917, entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," such proclamation being the prohibition of the use of foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That after December 31, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, for the purpose of conserving the man power of the Nation and to increase efficiency in the production of arms, war munitions, ships, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy, it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes any distilled spirits, and during said time no distilled spirits held in bond shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes except for export. After November 1, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, no grain, cereal, fruit, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes. After December 31, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the removal of distilled spirits held in bond after December 31, 1918, for other than beverage purposes, also in regard to the sale and distribution of wine for sacramental, medicinal, or other nonbeverage uses. After the approval of this act no distilled, malt, vinous, or other intoxicating liquors shall be imported into the United States.

Any person who violates any of the foregoing provisions shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $1,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, as I understand, the Secretary has completed the reading of an amendment reported by the committee on yesterday to the amendment contained in the bill as reported from the committee. I suggest it would be well for the Secretary to read the committee amendment in the bill. Has that yet been read?

The SECRETARY. It is in the bill now, and it was put in on yesterday.

Mr. PENROSE. I understand, but it has not been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator that by unanimous consent, the Chair thinks, on yesterday, certainly under the ruling of the Chair, the present occupant being then in the chair, this amendment was substituted by the committee for the amendment which had been theretofore proposed by the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, I should like to have in the RECORD the original amendment proposed by the committee, and I will ask that the Secretary read the amendment for which this is a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire whether the substitute offered by the committee has ever been printed? I do not see a copy of it on my desk.

Mr. PENROSE. The printed copies of the amendment are available.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the original amendment reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. The part proposed to be inserted originally by the committee reads as follows:

That after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war, for the purpose of conserving the man power of the Nation and to increase the efficiency in the production of arms, war munitions, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy, it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes, except for export, any distilled spirits, and no distilled spirits held in bond after June 30, 1919, shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes except for export. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the removal of distilled spirits held in bond after June 30, 1919, for other than beverage purposes or for export. After three months from the approval of this act until the conclusion of the present war, no grain, cereal, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer or other intoxicating malt liquors, and after the approval of this act no beer or other intoxicating malt liquors shall be imported into the United States for beverage purposes. After June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war, no foods or fruits shall be used in the manufacture or production of vinous intoxicating liquors except for export. Any person who violates any of the foregoing provisions or any of said rules and regulations made to carry the same into effect shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I desire to enter a point of order on the amendment as reported in the bill from the committee and on the amendment reported on yesterday as a substitute therefor, that both amendments, and more particularly the recent one, are general legislation on an appropriation bill in violation of the rule of the Senate. I shall not ask the Chair to rule immediately on the point, because I think a fuller attendance of the Senate is desirable, and I am informed that several Senators desire to speak on the general phases of the bill. I desire, however, to enter the point of order now and will ask the Chair to make the ruling at the proper time.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the unanimous-consent agreement under which we are proceeding, as I understand, all the amendments which are objected to will go over. Personally I have no objection to the point of order on the amendment being entered now, but I would suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that if under the unanimous-consent agreement he objects to the amendment, it would automatically go over until the unobjected amendments should be disposed of. The only point I want to make is that if we are going to take up this amendment now—personally, I do not care which course is pursued—then we ought to finish it finally, and not have some Senator object after we have considered it for two or three hours.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The point of order, if made, the Chair will treat as an objection under the unanimous-consent agreement, and therefore the amendment will go over until the unobjected amendments shall have been disposed of.

Mr. PENROSE. I want to say to the Senator from Nebraska that that was the idea I meant to convey.

Mr. NORRIS. That suits me. Now, I should like to clear the matter up a little, Mr. President. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania will agree with me that if he makes the point of order against the amendment as printed in the bill—of course that in reality is not in the bill——

Mr. PENROSE. And also against the substitute.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it is the substitute, if you call it a substitute, though it is not a substitute, as I understand the ruling of the Chair under what took place yesterday; it is a committee amendment, and the point of order against that is properly made, of course; but there is not any such thing as making the point of order against the other amendment that has gone out.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, Mr. President, I was not looking at the parliamentary status of the matter with a microscope. I did not know but that, if this amendment should be defeated, perchance then there would be before the Senate the original amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. PENROSE. But I do not care anything about that detail; that is immaterial.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not either. The committee has offered another amendment, and this is the committee amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I enter the point of order against the last amendment of the committee, which I now understand is contained in the bill as the report of the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. And I will let the matter go over, if it is objected to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next committee amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, with the understanding that the point of order is reserved—a question about which I desire to make no comment at this time—I wish to address myself to the general features of the bill.

The bill that is immediately pending before the Senate, being House bill 11945, has a multitude of supplemental items running up into a considerable sum of money. These are additional items to those contained in House bill 9054, which itself carries a total of $28,491,253. I presume it is almost regarded as sacrilegious to lay profane hands upon a bill referring to agriculture. For some 12 or 15 years this character of bill has been immune from criticism, and under the cover of that immunity items have crept in from year to year and from session to session until, like the proverbial mantle of charity, an Agricultural appropriation bill covers a multitude of sins. It is about time that a proper rebuke to some of those items should be administered. I know that many of us have sat in our seats here without evidencing any protest against a multitude of such expenditures. Possibly we have been derelict in our duty; we may be sharing in the moral responsibility of permitting those appropriations that have been made from the Treasury in the sessions or the years past, because we have voiced no audible protest against them. However, even if we may by our critics be put in the attitude of Satan rebuking sin, nevertheless it is better late than never.

I understand that years ago when heretics used to be tried—and the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] referred to this several days ago—or when an evil cause was pending before Papal authority, even the devil had an advocate to present, as best he could, the cause of that evil influence in the world. So even in the case of this Agricultural bill, I presume, items of an apparently indefensible character will have their advocates here on the floor, as they ought to have, for, if there is any good in them, let it be brought out. These items, however, have risen to that number so that in the aggregate they involve such a sum of money that it is about time that we called a halt.

I know that everything that is intended to be for the benefit of the farmer is supposed to be thereby sanctified, without any regard to what the nature of the item may be. I will refer, therefore, to these items in turn in order that a distinction may be sharply drawn between those items which are actually beneficial to agriculture, horticulture, live stock, and other branches of the agricultural industry, and those that are merely of a speculative character, designed more to pad pay rolls, in my judgment, than anything else.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a suggestion?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in its title this bill is described as a bill to stimulate agriculture for war purposes, and it is important to bear in mind in analyzing the bill whether the items are of a character pertaining to this war crisis.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; that only makes——

Mr. PENROSE. It makes stronger the statement made by the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; it only gives it a more limited scope than it ordinarily would have, for unless these items can fairly be connected with something that will strengthen us for the war, then there can be no excuse for many of the items in the supplemental bill or in the regular bill heretofore referred to.

The title of the bill declares that it is "to carry out * * * the purposes of the act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.'" The first purpose is the stimulation of agriculture to strengthen us for war. There is no use to talk about the distribution of something we have not. So the more limited scope of this bill would confine it to the stimulation which is justifiable by the declared purpose of the measure. This would limit it to a much narrower scope than the ordinary bill which is omnibus in character and designed to apply in that undefined territory known as agriculture and the production of food products of all kinds.

There are lurking in all these bills, as there have been for some four or five years, a great variety of items providing for the eradication of all kinds of pests—coyotes, wolves, foxes, badgers, prairie dogs, and noxious insects of all kinds, those that prey both upon the animal and the vegetable world—a variety of items that have aggregated vast sums of money.

The prairie dogs in the West are sometimes quite offensive; they burrow holes in the plains and render it unsafe for those who would ride beyond a mild trot. I have seen suggestions in various documents sent out by the Agricultural Department and by gentlemen who have taken counsel with wise chemists on how to destroy prairie dogs by the use of various kinds of poisonous gases. Nitrous oxide, or laughing gas, I once saw specified in a prescription for their extermination. It was mistaken for poisonous gas which would have exterminated the pest; but, at any rate, it was no worse than what I saw in a printed report from the Committee on Agriculture, in which one of the live-stock experts testified about Polled Angus cattle being the best dairy cattle in the world. If he had been asked the question what Holsteins and Jerseys were good for, I suppose he would have put them down as beef cattle. It is on a par with some of the proposed benefits to be derived from the extermination of various kind of disturbing vermin, both for man and domestic animals, and for the plant and vegetable kingdom.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED. I think the remarks of the Senator upon prairie dogs and laughing gas are of such interest that we ought to have a fuller attendance; and if it is not disagreeable to the Senator, I should like to suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection, Mr. President, to the Senator suggesting the absence of a quorum, but it is immaterial to me whether they come or not. I shall talk to the galleries or to the seats. I do not expect to convert many Senators; I will admit that; but I think, in common with the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Pennsylvania, it is high time that these items in the Agricultural appropriation bills were considered.

Mr. REED. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	McKellar	Sheppard
Baird	Harding	Martin	Sherman
Bankhead	Henderson	Nelson	Shields
Beckham	Hitchcock	New	Smith, Ariz.
Benet	Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Smoot
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Penrose	Swanson
Colt	Kenyon	Phelan	Thomas
Culberson	King	Pittman	Trammell
Curtis	Knox	Ransdell	Vardaman
Fletcher	Lenroot	Reed	Walsh
France	Lewis	Saulsbury	Warren
Gerry	McCumber	Shafroth

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, at this moment indulge me to say that the Senators whose names were given by the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] upon the previous roll call are still detained at the hearing of the Interstate Commerce Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, in the bill now pending before the Senate I find, on pages 2 and 3, what is a duplication—the eradication of cattle ticks, the eradication of influenza and strangle, and so forth. When these are taken with other general items in the regular appropriation bill, I believe it amounts to an extravagance and a useless expenditure of public money.

The production of sheep is provided for in an item of $60,000, on page 3. I wish to consider this in connection with an item in the regular appropriation bill on page 62. The production of sheep is not a question merely of time and range, or of the natural increase of the animal. It is a question of the preservation of the animal life after it shall have been made into potential additions to the wealth of the country. On page 62 it is provided in the House bill that $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, shall be used for investigating the extent and effect of the killing and harassing by dogs of sheep and other meat-producing animals, and of the best methods for reducing and preventing the same. That was in the House bill, and has been stricken out by the Senate, and no substitute has been provided in any other amendment, unless it should be an amendment of a general character which is merely discretionary with the power expending the money.

This House provision ought to stay in if any of them stay in. I regard it as much more important to check the inroads of useless dogs on the sheep supply of the country than to investigate the best way of exterminating coyotes. They are both in the same class. One is not more destructive than another. A sheep-killing dog can do more damage in the sheep belt than any other known animal. When that is taken in connection with the item of $60,000 for the production of sheep, on page 3 of the supplemental bill, it would work out an actual benefit; but the sheep production does not include the sheep preservation, so the $60,000 item, under the rule of strict construction ordinarily adopted by the department, would preclude the method of diminishing the available supply of useless dogs in the country. I think there is more necessity for that than there is for attempting to exterminate many of the noxious insects and animals that are provided for specifically in many of the items.

I believe a good dog license would do something toward that end. I think there ought to be a capitation or excise tax placed upon all the dogs of the country. It is a source of revenue and it is a means of regulation. This remedy probably never will be carried out until the useless curs of the country are subjected to some financial burden, to be paid by the owner.

If the $10,000 item should be restored the methods to be used are very simple. It does not require an expert from the live-stock department to ascertain the best method of stopping the destruction of the sheep supply through dogs. All you have to do is to locate the dog and kill him. A clothesline is available for that purpose. You need not waste explosives on him in war times. Just take a clothesline and hang him. That is the easiest way; but nobody seems to have thought of it in the Department of Agriculture. There are all kinds of high-priced methods of exterminating the animal, such as chloroform and expensive poisons. The chloroform does no good unless you catch the dog, so that ordinarily it is a question of the activity of the investigator; but the $10,000 item, if it should be restored, ought to be devoted to taking a census of the dog population of the 48 States first, and especially in the sheep belt the character of the dog ought to be investigated. That can be helped along, probably, for the $10,000. Whenever the dog is under suspicion no chances ought to be taken in the sheep belt. Dogs are very prolific—much more so than sheep, in proportion. While they have been objects of invidious legislation for many centuries, the dog has survived from primeval times. It is easy enough to get a supply of dogs. The only question is about preserving the sheep supply for wool and mutton. Instead of taking that sensible way of diminishing the risk to the sheep production, it seems that they are taking the roundabout bypath of some scientific method. I suppose they will need a psychologist on the dog before it is done, in order to enable them to investigate the mentality of the dog and discover why it is that a dog has an appetite for mutton, and thereby, if you would destroy the appetite, you would remove the evil, instead of removing the dog. If you would revive what was referred to in the esteemed Speaker's lyric in 1912, when he was a candidate in the national Democratic convention, "Quit kicking my hound dog around," and develop a good crop of hounds of the Missouri breed, it would do more to preserve and multiply the sheep supply than all the appropriations, including Mr. Houston as the head of the Department of Agriculture, that have been known since this administration began.

The trouble is the dog has disappeared as a useful animal. He has become an ornamental beast.

I would rather have one good hound dog, with a tan border and an ear like a Persian rug, turned loose to preserve the food supply and to preserve the balance of food products than all of the pampered white pests that are going around town led by a darkey maid, with a cable attached to a collar around his neck, taking the air every morning. There is more time spent with those degenerate, sore-eyed brutes than there is on all the babies in Washington. I would discriminate in the taxation. One that is kept for ornamental purposes as a canine luxury ought to be taxed, in a childless household, $50 as a minimum. That would produce revenue; with that and with the $10,000 provided on page 62 of the Agricultural appropriation bill it will enable us to kill off all of the useless ones and start on the coyotes to preserve the supply of sheep.

I think this amendment, Mr. President, ought to be restored in lieu of the one on page 3, to which I made allusion the other evening in an inquiry when the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] had the floor, an item of $52,950 for making cottage cheese on the farm.

I do not know whether some of the earlier tribe to which I belong have too little respect for the modern way to make these old-time food products or not, but to me this item is ridiculous, supremely so. What is cottage cheese? If you are lucky enough to have milk in the crock during a thunderstorm, it will cottage cheese itself without an appropriation. All you need is to sour the milk, and either hot weather or patience will do it—either one. Just let it alone for a while, and after it is soured all you have to do, when it is reduced to a curd, is to beat it up a little; and if you like any kind of seasoning in it put it in; if not, eat it in a natural state. It is nutritious. It is a good thing to eat. It is said to be an antidote for old age, and it ought to be extremely popular in the Senate. The chemists some years ago in the valleys of the Ural investigated the great longevity of the people residing in that country. It led up to the fact that they were habitual consumers of curds, sour milk. Then they went to analyzing, and they found that it had in it what the chemists call a beneficial microbe; it made war on the microbe of old age. It purified the blood, made it active, fortified one against hardening of the arteries and softening of the brain and an indisposition to exercise and the tendency to enlarge the waist band of the trousers and keep you down to your normal size. I read a report on that from a very learned chemist at one time that occupied me nearly a half day. It was full of information, but the result of it was eat cottage cheese or drink sour milk or eat curds.

When using the scientific name, I notice they do not call it cottage cheese. They call it by a dignified name. I remember when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] once spoke of oleomargarine, he wanted to leave the "oleo" off. That means oil, and it seemed to be a little bit too thick. He wanted to leave it off and just call it "margarine"; it was more euphonious. So, in referring to cottage cheese, I shall refer to it hereafter as curds. That is the chemical name.

Mr. PENROSE. Perhaps some member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry may enlighten us as to what is the objective in the investigation of cottage cheese. It might be interesting to ascertain whether there is any member of the committee who knows what it is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would be very glad if any member of the committee has original information on the subject.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] is here.

Mr. SHERMAN. Or any Member of the Senate outside of the committee, so that we may learn what it is.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator from Illinois a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. Will he please inform the Senate the distinction between cottage cheese and Limburger cheese?

Mr. SHERMAN. There are two vital points, Mr. President, in which they differ and by which a novice would not make a mistake. It is the age and the odor. You might mistake one, but you never can mistake the other.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Wyoming, if the Senator will permit an interruption, is a member of the committee, and I should like to ask him if he has any information as to the purpose of the department in this cottage-cheese investigation as a war measure?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I must confess that when this bill was under consideration I did not spend an hour or a moment in the Committee on Agriculture. Every day that that committee was in session I was in attendance upon the Committee on Military Affairs as a member of a subcommittee or as a member of a conference committee.

I may say, while I am on my feet, that I do not approve of this bill as a whole, nor in many of the particulars.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield with pleasure.

Mr. NELSON. I had a letter some time ago from a lady in Iowa referring to this cottage-cheese matter. She said there were women traveling around the State giving instructions to the farmers' wives how to make cottage cheese. They claimed to be employees of the Government and were getting $8 a day and their expenses. She wrote to me a very inquiring letter and wanted to know if these things were so. She felt that, if true, it was a great piece of extravagance. I referred her letter to one of the executive departments and never heard any more from it. Can the Senator give us any information on that point? Has the Government men and women out instructing farmers' wives in the West and Northwest how to make cottage cheese?

Mr. PENROSE. At $8 a day.

Mr. NELSON. At $8 a day, or $6, or any other per diem? I am curious to know, because I am very sorry I did not keep a copy of the letter. I sent it to a department for investigation, but I have had no return. However, I have given the Senator the substance of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would have been glad if the Senator had preserved a copy of the letter. It is apparently a small matter, that one item of $52,950 proposed in the bill for a purpose of this kind, but it is well enough to take some time over it. That $52,950 may look larger to me than to the average Senator, but I suppose most of us are not worth that much, if we had our debts paid and our rent bills in the District here settled.

I have had both oral communications and, I think, a few letters, if I had time to search my files, of the same kind the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has mentioned, to the effect that experts have been going among the women on the farms and giving them information on how to take care of dairy products, including curds. It had not reached that great elaboration and detail that it has now; but upon two occasions, in oral conversations with ladies and their husbands from agricultural districts in the West or Northwest, they have spoken of this great desire to illuminate the farm kitchens of the country. I refer to the women who come here, the farmers' wives, the ones who do not keep house by proxy, by servants. With them it is a matter of supreme concern. One old lady who was here said they came out into her kitchen and began to tell her about things which she knew were not so, for she tried it for 40 years in her kitchen, and it would not work.

Here is something that is of very great advantage on the cottage-cheese end of it, while I am talking about this item. If we are going to have any genuine conservation of food products so as to utilize the sour milk, Mr. President, the first thing we have got to do is to take dilettante of this country in tow and cultivate their appetites. There will be no consumption of cottage cheese unless there is an appetite for that brand of edible. To the average man looking over a bill of fare in the city whose appetite has become debased or degenerated by a long course of survival on such a menu as ordinarily is put forth at a hotel or a public eating place, he has lived on caviar, preserved animal products of uncertain age, or canned goods, or bread made from patent flour, or things that have as little nutriment in them as an Egyptian mummy. I would just as lief go down to the Smithsonian Institution and eat a mummy that was wrapped 4,600 years ago during one of the reigns of the forgotten Rameses. We have eaten such stuff until we have had our appetite somewhat perverted.

Men complain to me about eating war bread. A Senator told me not long ago that even the coal miners in his State when they went to buy 25 pounds of wheat flour and had to buy 25 pounds of the substitute at the enhanced price to which the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] referred yesterday, in going home threw the substitute in the gutter and took the 25 pounds of flour home. They would not eat corn meal; they would not eat barley flour or rye; they had been accustomed to eating wheat-flour bread; and they would not eat a mixture. They will not eat war bread. They would be healthier if they did.

So it is the people's appetite. The healthiest bread there is in the world is the bread made from the whole wheat berry without taking a thing out of it. The man who invented patent flour or the bolting process by which all the coarser portions of the grain were taken out and nothing but the purified flour left did not add anything to the happiness or health of the human race. Patent flour has not in it much more nutriment than that much putty. There is nothing in it but gluten. I looked over an analysis of whole-wheat flour, made out of the entire berry, without a thing taken out, and an analysis of a sample of patent flour. You could not feed dumb brutes with the cereal product that a human being is eating, and keep them alive for 12 months. The greatest tribute to the toughness of the human race physically is the fact that it can live on what it eats and keep a reasonable degree of health.

If we are to come to a cottage-cheese basis, the first thing we must do is to cultivate the appetite of the consumer. You will have to have lectures dilating on the value of cottage cheese as a food product. I can imagine having gentlemen of the kind that need these lectures in a hall, a thousand of them.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. NELSON. Speaking about the cultivation of the appetite, there is a kind of a cheese they call Brick cheese. The Senator has probably heard about it. That was introduced and the taste for it was cultivated over the lager-beer counter. Could not something of the kind be done with cottage cheese?

Mr. SHERMAN. If we had something to act as a stimulus it is possible.

Mr. PENROSE. How can that happen if we get national prohibition?

Mr. SHERMAN. Of course, that presents an appalling possibility.

Mr. PENROSE. It shows that prohibition is a menace to cottage cheese. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHERMAN. It is also a menace to the pretzel, but really the only thing offensive in the pretzel is its shape, like some human beings. It is really a nourishing product. People could very well exchange their cereal food and put pretzels on the table if you would only change the form. They are unpopular now because of the nature of our public enemy. Along with sauerkraut it has become almost a prohibitive article. Anybody who would say a good word for either might possibly be given a trip on a rail.

Mr. PENROSE. Twenty years.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to ask the Senator whether he has noticed that in addition to these substitutes, some of which are entirely palatable, they compel the householders to buy a large quantity of bran with the flour they have been eating, thereby raising the cost of cow feed to an extraordinary height and compelling human beings to eat it?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I have noticed that. In fact, I have been a devotee of bran diet for several years myself, not with a desire to injure the cow, however. I take the ordinary flour, and in order to get back what ought never to have been taken out, according to my standard of living, I buy bran and eat them both. I have to buy them separately. I can not mix them, but the result is just the same.

What the Senator from West Virginia refers to as compelling purchasers to buy bran is true. It is making stock food higher. That is a form of substitute for wheat flour. If the whole grain were milled together and the bran were left in, you would get a whole wheat bread that would not require these regulations from the Food Department.

But the cottage-cheese item of $52,950 ought to be stricken out, Mr. President, because it serves no useful purpose. People will not eat cottage cheese outside of a limited few unless their appetites are very radically changed. Certain people in the city want it. They get it, some of them, from the regular dairy driver, who brings it around for them, but only by special arrangement. If you go to the bill of fare and look at it at any place, it is very seldom you find it, and it is chiefly some very frugal cook who takes the sour milk that is a waste product otherwise of the establishment and converts it into cottage cheese. If you will notice on the bills of fare where cottage cheese is accessible there will not be one person out of ten who ever orders it. They never will order it until their appetites are cultivated. I have seen them order Roquefort or Schweitzer. I have seen them send for Limburger. It is never upon the table ordinarily, for prudential reasons, but it can be ordered, and I have seen them eat all these compounds, but not one time in ten have I seen them order cottage cheese.

Not only is it barren of any odoriferous taint, but it has in it all the elements of the high-priced cheese, some of which was brought before the war from across the seas. If there were to-day a crusade entered upon by which the different varieties of cheese would be simplified, I would have no objection to devoting some money to that purpose; but Roquefort cheese, while it is very palatable and in a reasonable amount is healthful, yet ordinarily to the novice who has not acquired the cultivated habit of eating it it looks like cottage cheese in the last and extremest stages of putrefaction. The more green streaks it has in it, the more variegated yellow that comes up close to the border, and the greater the prismatic landscape that can be seen in a cube of Roquefort cheese, the more nearly perfect it was in its manufacture.

That is largely a question which appeals to the eye. Those who are experts in eating it like to look at it just as the smoker of a Habana likes to look at the curling smoke. A man can shut his eyes and derive but very little satisfaction from a cigar that costs from 25 cents to $1, whereas he may get a Pittsburgh stogy or a rope made in the local shops at home, open his eyes, and see it curl toward the zenith with admiration, although it comes at a price of three for a nickel. That shows that human imagination is very largely involved in the element of pleasure.

It is possible, as I was going to suggest when I was diverted from that line of thought a while ago, that if these gentlemen whose appetites need cultivation were gotten together in a hall some place by some expert from the Agricultural Department they could be reasoned with. I have tried to visualize the kind of an audience the expert would have that he would gather in from the curbstone. They would be always distinguishable. If you look at their index finger the yellow mark ordinarily is on the right hand. Sometimes if they are left-handers it is on the left-hand index finger, but they are never to be misunderstood. The yellow stain proclaims them as habitual cigarette smokers. Not the kind that merely take the smoke in and eject it in the ordinary way, but inhale it into their lungs, thereby obtaining a prolonged satisfaction at the expense of their bronchial tubes and other respiratory organs. They never eat cottage cheese. If they ever eat anything, it is the manufactured cheese and the pretzel. The ordinary gentlemen of that kind in Chicago, inside of the "loop" of the first ward, are the kind who need the instruction. They are free-lunch fiends. For many years they have subsisted, the greater part of their lives, on free lunches. What prohibition will do with them is left to a merciful Providence. I shall not undertake to analyze their condition in that event; but with the stimulus taken away from them by the foam-crested "schooner," the cheap gin, inside of the "loop," which costs 3 cents for each slug administered to the patient—when they have that, the pretzel, and the overaged accompaniments that go with it, and the lower meat products manufactured into viands of various degrees of stringiness and toughness, which look well enough, will make trouble; if a man had to eat it sober, I do not know what would become of him. It requires a certain amount of stimulus of some kind to be able to absorb nutriment of that character. He is the type you have got to take in and educate to eat cottage cheese. He would never eat it if he is let alone.

Go to the opposite pole of the social equation and you find the man who is a habitual diner out, who is a seasoned, hardened veteran, a banqueter of many courses, of nine kinds of liquor, and of many years' experience. It is no use to tell such a man he is digging his grave with his teeth. He prefers to have a good time while he is here, and to let the grave take its chances of being dug. So on he goes. His appetite will no more be addicted to cottage cheese than it will be to branch water as the ordinary method of slaking his thirst.

I am moved to inquire whether the Department of Agriculture knows the kind of a problem it is undertaking. I do not think it does know it, nor do I believe it very much cares. What it does care for is that some supposedly wise person, male or female, has suggested that $52,950 would just about reach the requirements of the persons out on the road now, together with seasonable additions for the next 12 months' line of food endeavor.

In further explanation of why that ought to go out I will say that on page 12 of the general Agricultural appropriation bill, in lines 11 and 12, are certain items explaining the purposes for which they are given.

> To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to collect and disseminate information concerning live stock, dairy, and other animal products.

This is a dairy product. Under that item, which is quite liberal, there is an abundant opportunity, without any violent construction of the language, to provide for such instruction on the production and consumption of dairy cheese as may be necessary.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator will note that over a million dollars in the general Agricultural appropriation bill is appropriated for the kind of investigation he is referring to—$500,000 in the paragraph ending in line 11, page 13, and another $500,000 in line 19.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not found the page where it is summed up.

Mr. PENROSE. It is over a million dollars for that one purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN. The fact that over a million dollars is provided for that purpose is ample reason why this specific item of $52,950 in the other bill, which appears to be in that particular an afterthought, ought not to be allowed.

Then, on page 15 of the general bill there is a further appropriation, which is cumulative to the one already spoken of for the purpose of cottage cheese. The provision is:

> For all necessary expenses for investigations and experiments in dairy industry, cooperative investigations of the dairy industry in the various States, inspection of renovated-butter factories and markets, $364,390.

That is an investigation of the dairy industry. Cottage cheese is a part of the dairy industry. There is no reason for this item of $52,950 to be in addition to those two provisions already made, either of which is amply broad enough to provide for the investigation of this particular item.

Then, leaving this subject of cottage cheese, I will remark as to renovated-butter factories that I have several of those in my particular bailiwick. They are scattered around over various parts of the United States, often in close proximity to large dairy sections. I have noticed that the renovated-butter factory is always lurking in the vicinity of a great dairy belt.

The butter that becomes rancid in a grocery or which spoils before it reaches the retail dealer, either from insufficient icing, from improper handling, or from the native filth that may be incorporated in it by the original producer, all hastening to produce that rancid state which repels the consumer—many thousand pounds of that variety of butter are collected at a single point and shipped to the renovated-butter factory. It is there treated with boracic acid; it is churned with unskimmed milk and coloring matter is added. It is churned with that preservative and sometimes illegitimately with other preservatives that are much more unhealthy than is boracic acid or the trace that is left in it after the butter is washed.

It is then sent to Washington and sold as original Elgin butter from the Fox River Valley, Illinois. I know the difference between reworked butter coming out of a renovated-butter factory and the original product. If they want to investigate that, I have no objection to it. It serves a useful purpose, but it needs supervision by some authority outside of those who are preparing the product and getting it to the consumer. Under that item they can just as well investigate the question of manufacturing cottage cheese as to have a separate item of $364,000 and over provided for that purpose.

On page 26 of the regular appropriation bill—and I take all of these items in connection with each other, because the two bills are interrelated, and while one is a stimulus—the smaller bill, known as House bill 11945—yet they dovetail in together. Beginning on line 7 we find:

For the investigation and improvement of fruits, and the methods of fruit growing, harvesting, and, in cooperation with the Bureau of Markets, studies of the behavior of fruits during the processes of marketing and while in commercial storage, $85,280.

I do not know just what they will discover as to "the behavior of fruits during the process of marketing," but I have discovered some phenomena that are worthy of investigation. One is an inevitable tendency on the part of the boxes or packages holding the fruit. The particular amount for this purpose is $85,280. I do not know how this estimate was reached, and I would be glad to inquire from some member of the committee if he or any other member knows how this particular amount was arrived at. What is the $280 for? Why was it not made a round $100,000 or $200,000?

Mr. PENROSE. At least.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes; at least, as the Senator from Pennsylvania suggests. It is a mere matter of figures. It is like suing a person. When you are laying the damages at the end of the declaration, you might just as well sue for a million dollars as for 10 cents; it is merely a matter of a few curls of the pen or the depression of a few typewriter keys. Why was it not made a couple of hundred thousand dollars? How did they arrive at $85,280? I might have a suspicion that it was to fit an existing pay roll, with possibly a 10 per cent addition or whatever was thought to be a legitimate increase in the requirements of that part of the department's activities.

But "the behavior of fruits" is something that interests everybody in Washington. I have noticed a most reprehensible tendency on the part of the bottom of the package or box containing fruits to rise; it gets farther and farther from the outside margin of what had once been the bottom. I think Isaac Newton discovered the law of gravity that pulls everything down. I should like to have some wise man in the Department of Agriculture discover the law that pulls the bottom of boxes up.

There is another thing which I can understand, namely, that the boxes are never full. Last week I measured one of the boxes of blackberries that I took home, and it lacked nearly an inch—eleven-twelfths of an inch—of reaching the top edge of the box. I do not think the grower of the blackberries brings them in in that way. I took this particular box and turned it upside down, and I found that the bottom of the box, in addition to obeying the mysterious law of rising, had three thicknesses of brown paper folded up and laid in. I did not buy brown paper; that is not a nutritious article of food; I bought berries; but not only did the bottom of the box rise, but the bottom of the box was bolstered up and padded worse than any actress ever seen in Washington—padded with brown paper; and when I measured it after compression I found that the entire stolen space in that box was 1¼ inches.

That occurred where? In the District of Columbia. This is the model city of North America. Here it is that an example is set for all the world, and especially for all of the heathen that come from west of Pittsburgh. We are asked for such appropriations as this to enable some expert to tell us how to market berries and to enable him to study "the behavior of fruits during the process of marketing." I want them first to investigate and discover the behavior of the boxes.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, these are war measures.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; that is correct. And after the dealer gets the box with the fruit in it, I should like the department to investigate him. I will wager any official of the Department of Agriculture a silk tile—which he can have at my expense—that I can go out with any investigator of the department in the city of Washington, and I can find duplicates of that box in hundreds of places in Washintgon. It will encourage us to fight the Hun if we can get what we pay for. Here, where the benignant countenance of that colossal figure that rests on the dome of the Capitol looks eastward to warn all the monarchs of the world that free government is our birthright, we can not, even in the city of Washington, stop the fruit dealers and those handling berries from swindling us out of an inch and a quarter of depth in their boxes. Before the department attempts to remove the mote from the eye of the old lady in the kitchen out on the western farm and to instruct her in the mysteries of cottage cheese, I want them to pluck the beam out of the eye of the Washington fruit and berry dealer.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest to my distinguished friend, that in talking so much about the law of gravitation, he has perhaps forgotten that the law of capillary attraction may prompt the bottom of the box to rise.

Mr. SHERMAN. I had not thought of that, and I thank the Senator from Utah for making the valuable suggestion. I think I will communicate with some of the great professors of physics and advise them that the law of capillary attraction in the case of a piece of brown paper has been so strong as to spring the bottom of a wooden box. [Laughter.] I never knew that before; it is an explanation, however, that is worthy of investigation out of this $85,280 fund.

On page 57 of the general agricultural appropriation bill—and I wish to hurry along, Mr. President, because I do not desire to take any more time than actually is necessary to call attention to these matters—I find the following item:

For investigations of insects affecting deciduous fruits, orchards, vineyards, and nuts, $93,380—

There is that degree of certainty and particularity in the appropriation that makes me anxious for information from some member of the committee as to how this particular sum was arrived at—

Provided, That $9,600 of said sum shall be available for the investigation of insects affecting the pecan and method of control of same.

There is one insect in the country that affects the pecan more than anything else, and a town constable or a deputy sheriff can cure it. I refer to the gentlemen who go out and cut the pecan trees down. Instead of taking the nuts off the tree—they could steal the nuts, and that would be bad enough—they cut the tree down. That has been the besetting evil all up and down the northern pecan belt. It is a nut which assumes considerable importance, and the regulation of this evil would do more even than to track the insects that are supposed to be waging destructive warfare on this article of food.

Then, in line 11, on page 57, of the same bill, I find the following item:

For investigations of insects affecting cereal and forage crops, including a special investigation of the Hessian fly and the chinch bug, $122,060.

I wish to go forward now to page 58, where, in lines 7 and 8, is found the following:

For investigations, identification, and systematic classification of miscellaneous insects, including the study of insects affecting the health of man and domestic animals, household insects, and the importation and exchange of useful insects, $52,330.

There are useful insects in the country, but their number unfortunately is very small compared with the number of noxious ones. It is like the eternal struggle between good and evil except that in a pronounced degree the evil insects overbalance the good. There is more difficulty in finding useful insects, those that will do good and will prey upon the evil ones, than there is in finding the other kind.

But this exchange of useful insects will be construed with the language at the bottom of page 58, where the gypsy moth and brown-tail moth, or both the same kind, shall be hedged against by introducing and establishing the parasites and natural enemies of these insects and colonizing them within the infested territory. This provides another appropriation of $304,050, making a total appropriation of nearly $1,000,000—$986,680 all together.

Mr. President, these provisions are specific in amount. I should like to inquire from some member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry if any investigation has been had that will tend to destroy the insect known as Cimex lectularius? Is there any member of the committee here? This insect is one of the greatest pests known to civilized man. It is nocturnal in its habits. It is carnivorous in its diet. It is indestructible in its longevity and its ability to escape the efforts of man to exterminate it. It is not found in primeval times and ages. Like the English sparrow, it is an attendant of civilized communities.

Prior to coming to this Chamber, I spent a good part of my life on the road, and I had a vast experience with this insect. It is known to polite society and to hotel keepers and to scientists as Cimex lectularius. By the proletariat it is called the bedbug. I wish to inquire from the head of the Department of Agriculture and from the chairman of the committee, when he shall resume his seat, if there are any efforts in their investigation of interstate commerce to stop the spread of this carnivorous pest? It has done more to sap the vitality of the human race and interfere with the ability successfully to make war on the Kaiser than anything I know of. It is worse than the chinch bug. The chinch bug is a relic compared with his primeval forays. It is an insect that belongs to an earlier age. It is no longer the pest that it was. With the country settled up, with the grass burned out, with no longer the opportunity for it to hide and hatch as in days gone by, the chinch bug is not now the standing menace to the crops that it was. There is provision made here for taking care of chinch bugs. I do not know how many other bugs could be provided for; but the writer of the bill, or those in the department who have had charge of that, have unwittingly allowed a vast number of insects to escape. I can think of any number of noxious insects that are not specifically mentioned in this bill, and can only be covered by the general phrase of "other hurtful insects." They seem to have exhausted their stock of information on noxious insects.

I have already referred to the clause that is stricken out on page 62, preventing sheep-killing dogs from continuing their devastations.

On page 82 there is what seems to me a wholly indefensible item:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make studies of cooperation among farmers in the United States in matters of rural credits and of other forms of cooperation in rural communities.

What is the use of that? Reduced to practical effect, it is a colporteur going in rural districts teaching farmers how to borrow money from the Government. Note its language:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make studies of cooperation among farmers in the United States in matters of rural credits.

There is the rural-credit bank. The farmer already knows how to cooperate to take care of himself, to spread useful information about crop raising, about live stock. He knows how to take care of the restoration of his soil. He learns that by local laws. All the great agricultural and live-stock States of the Union now have a system of their own. They have county agents; they have State authorities. Under their State universities they are getting detailed and accurate information upon how to take care of these different problems. In proportion as they have learned these things the demand on borrowing money from the Treasury subsides. Here is an invitation to the Secretary of Agriculture to send out investigators to teach the farmers of certain parts of the United States how to approach the Treasury to borrow money. I think it is utterly indefensible, Mr. President, and it ought to be stricken out.

On page 83 is a cumulative provision of $5,000, reading as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the act entitled "An act to fix standards for Climax baskets for grapes and other fruits and vegetables, and to fix standards for baskets and other containers for small fruits, berries, and vegetables, and for other purposes," approved August 31, 1916, including the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary, in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $5,000.

That item ought to go out. There is no reason why that ought to be in the bill in addition to the sum already provided for on page 26, with precisely the same purpose; and this serves no other purpose, that I can see, except to expend $5,000 more.

Then, on page 88, is this item:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in cooperation with the authorities of the States concerned, or with individuals, to make such investigations and demonstrations as may be necessary in connection with the development of live-stock production in the cane-sugar and cotton districts of the United States, including the erection of barns and other necessary buildings, and the employment of persons and means in the city of Washington and elsewhere, $60,000.

That reminds me that in the cane-sugar country there must be some occasion for an appropriation of this kind. It must be because the cane-sugar industry in some places has decayed. It is no longer profitable. For some reason, prior to the beginning of the war it was found that no returns could be had on the investment. Some of the cane-sugar manufacturers are in the business not of original choice, but because they have inherited the property; it has come down to them from their ancestors. Some of them are very small in their holdings. They are of the French blood. They do not part with land; and as the family multiplies the land itself is subdivided into very small holdings; and anyone who is familiar with that country knows that these small holders, in the aggregate, amount to a considerable part of the cane-sugar producers. Now, the large sugar-plantation men, those like Mr. Matthews and others out a way from New Orleans, have very large investments. They buy the crude sugar from the small producers and put it in shape where they themselves can job it to the sugar refineries. But the mere fact that on page 88 of the Agricultural appropriation bill $60,000 is thought to be necessary to restore the prosperity of the cane-sugar area is a tremendous commentary upon what has occurred under certain economic conditions. I shall not oppose that. If these men who found in peace times that it was no longer profitable to produce sugar can be helped to the extent of $60,000, I have no objection to that item. I only call attention to the necessity for such an item and the fact that we are running on an economic principle that requires such appropriations.

Again, on page 91:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to meet the emergency caused by the existence of the pink bollworm of cotton in Mexico, and to prevent the establishment of such insect in the United States by the employment of all means necessary, including rent outside of the District of Columbia.

There is one part of that that is impossible to be performed—the provision here that the Secretary shall meet the emergency of the pink bollworm of cotton in Mexico. I do not think any investigator will care to go across the line into the cotton-producing area in Mexico, outside of a comparatively small area along the border, just on the other side of the Rio Grande. To reach the parts where the pink bollworm comes from, its origin in the most dangerous form, you must reach the interior of Mexico.

To do that involves an investigator in considerable risk. There are worse things than pink worms there. This is an impossible item in that much of it; and I would suggest to the chairman of the committee that that much of it be modified, because this is a $50,000 item, and, so far as it expects an investigator to go across the border to look into the destruction of the pink bollworm there, it is on a par with the item of $52,950 for cottage cheese. It is absolutely impossible under present conditions to be usefully expended.

I do not enter at great length upon this item in elaborating the reasons; but carrying over farther, after page 91, on page 92, beginning in line 14, I find the following:

To make surveys to determine the actual distribution of the pink bollworm in Mexico and to exterminate local infestations in Mexico near the border of the United States, in cooperation with the Mexican Government or local Mexican authorities, $25,000;

To investigate in Mexico or elsewhere the pink bollworm as a basis for control measures, $25,000.

Here is a total of $100,000, a part of which may reasonably be expected to be expended in the interior of Mexico or across the line. There is no safety, nor is there any certainty that anybody can produce any useful results by an investigation across the border. It seems to me that these items ought to be reduced so as to bring them within the possibility of performance.

Upon page 99 is a general provision, in section 14, as follows:

That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. The President shall thereupon fix such guaranteed price for each of the official grain standards for wheat as established under the United States grain-standards act, approved August 11, 1916. The President shall from time to time establish and promulgate such regulations as he shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment and differences in price for the several standard grades at the local elevator or the local railway market where such wheat is delivered from the farm where produced, adopting No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent as the basis. Thereupon the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States that, upon compliance by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guaranty within the period, not exceeding 18 months, prescribed in the notice a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section. In such regulations the President shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty. The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 2 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2.50 per bushel at the local elevator or the local railway market where such wheat is delivered from the farm where produced.

This is a committee amendment, the reading of which I have just completed. It places in the hands of the President the power to fix prices for wheat. It is entirely dependent upon the President. It depends upon no congressional action after the passage of this bill containing section 14, the committee amendment; but it takes away from Congress, unless it should legislate by amending this article, or repealing it, any further power in the way of price regulation of wheat. It seems to me that Congress should keep that power. We have entered upon the era of price fixing. Two dollars and twenty cents was fixed here in former legislation as the basic price. If Congress has once entered upon the course of price fixing, it must keep the power and must continue from time to time to regulate the prices. I do not believe that power should be delegated to a department. In name it is delegated to the President, but we all know that that is only a nominal delegation of power; that practically it puts the fixing of the price of wheat in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture, who in turn will delegate it out to some employees or subordinates.

In fact, it puts upon the President a power which can be exercised by him only by again delegating the power which we vest in him. It leaves it in the hands of persons with this delegated power, then, to fix the price of wheat from time to time. Where it will come from, who it will be, how they will exercise that power, what degree of wisdom or folly will manifest itself in judging of market conditions under which the farmer or wheat producer will dispose of his surplus products, we know nothing. We delegate in general blanket terms that power. I believe Congress ought to keep the power and fix by its own action a basic price, subject to amendment from time to time, instead of delegating it to a department.

But, if we have once delegated it to a department, it will stay there. All of us know how extremely difficult it is to recall a delegated power and resume its operation by Congress. It is there subject to the usual amplification, to the elaboration which the department finds upon the application to which it inevitably becomes subject. These matters, I think, Mr. President, are ones that would properly call for an amendment of the general bill.

In regard to the amendment offered this morning striking out the former committee amendment on page 6, I wish to comment briefly. This is what is known as the prohibition amendment. I would prefer the original committee amendment, if my will controlled on that matter.

There are now available in stock in the country about 200,000,000 gallons of whisky which ordinarily would be devoted to beverage purposes. Former legislation destroyed the distillery in this country, so far as it produces a beverage. All the distilling of potable liquors coming from distilleries were discontinued pursuant to the last act of Congress on that subject. The distillers of this country have acquiesced in that arrangement. They have, as far as possible, converted their distilleries into plants for the production of industrial alcohol. Of the parts of a distillery that could be used only for the manufacture of whisky, the large warehouses required for storing it in bond, some will now be unavailable or will not be needed. The parts or the structures where the whisky is racked off, a large part of the cooperage used, will no longer be valuable property. They acquiesced in the arrangement. They have adjusted their business to the former amendment.

The banks of the country have loaned on warehouse certificates of a very large quantity of whisky held in bond considerable sums of money. I am not overly tender about the property rights that attach to intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage. I believe, however, some fairer arrangement to take care of the established credit on the basis of warehouse certificates on whisky in other forms should be had before the ban of the law is put upon that form of what heretofore has been legitimate property.

I would vote, Mr. President, for the Government to take over the whole of the 200,000,000 gallons, export it, sell it for legitimate purposes to hospitals, use it for medical purposes until the last gallon of it shall have been consumed, rather than to disturb the credit and bring on possible bankruptcy—not to say, in some communities, panic—where the sums loaned to individual holders of warehouse certificates will exceed the capital stock of the bank making the loan. I do not believe this matter has been given altogether as much consideration as it ought to have. I am not prepared to say that if some fair solution of it can not be worked out I will not vote for it in its original severity, but I do believe that more care ought to be had in the protection of the property rights involved.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KENDRICK. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Smith, Md.
Baird	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Kellogg	Penrose	Smoot
Borah	Kendrick	Phelan	Sutherland
Calder	Kenyon	Poindexter	Swanson
Chamberlain	King	Pomerene	Thomas
Colt	Lenroot	Ransdell	Thompson
Culberson	Lewis	Saulsbury	Trammell
Curtis	McCumber	Shafroth	Underwood
Fernald	McKellar	Sheppard	Vardaman
Fletcher	Martin	Sherman	Walsh
France	Nelson	Shields	Warren
Gore	New	Simmons
Johnson, Cal.	Norris	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Does the first amendment in the bill go over under objection, the amendment permitting the Secretary of Agriculture to employ persons within the draft age?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that it went over on the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. My recollection was that it went over, but I was not certain that the Secretary had made a note of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary so informs the Chair. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 15, strike out the words "grain, hay" and the comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is, in line 16, strike out "$180,720" and insert "$30,000."

Mr. KING. Is this subject to amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. KING. I move to amend by striking out the entire item.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah moves to amend the amendment by striking out the entire item.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. That will necessitate the elimination of the words "market news service on feeds and seeds."

The SECRETARY. Strike out, on page 8, lines 15 and 16, the following: "Market news service on feeds and seeds, $30,000," up to the semicolon. It leaves in the semicolon.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 17 strike out the word "surveys" and insert "survey."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 17, strike out "$449,700" and insert "$100,000."

Mr. KING. I move to amend that by striking out "$100,000."

Mr. FLETCHER. That would leave it without any appropriation at all.

Mr. KING. Exactly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The department could not pay the salaries.

Mr. KING. Exactly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think it ought to be stricken out. Either the whole provision ought to be stricken out or the appropriation should be left in.

Mr. KING. I regard the whole thing as useless, a work of supererogation, a purpose to give employment to a number of incompetent men, as most of these items are for.

Mr. FLETCHER. The fertilizer situation is very important.

Mr. NORRIS. I make a point of order on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will please state it.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand we are considering only committee amendments now.

Mr. PENROSE. This is a committee amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. If the committee amendment prevails, then there is not anything to vote on after the committee amendment is left in the bill. I concede the Senator might move to cut down the amount as small as he wants, but I object to cutting it all out. In fact, it will have just the opposite effect, as I understand it, from what the Senator is trying to accomplish.

Mr. KING. It seems to me the mere fact that the House agreed upon a certain amount and the Senate committee amended it, and the question is upon agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senate committee would not preclude an emandation by the Senate eliminating the entire item. I do not understand that it would be subject to the point of order. Therefore, to make the matter very clear, I move to strike out the following words, found in line 17, page 8:

Fertilizer survey of the United States, $100,000.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator ought to include the words in line 16, "food and."

Mr. KING. I move to amend by striking out the following: "Food and fertilizer."

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand we have already agreed to the committee amendment striking out "surveys" and inserting "survey."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator can not therefore move to amend it.

Mr. KING. If that be true, then my amendment will go only to the word "fertilizer," in line 16, and the words "survey of the United States, $100,000," in line 17.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I make the point of order that we are proceeding under a unanimous-consent agreement by which we are to consider only unobjected amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was not aware of that unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas if the unanimous-consent agreement, of which I was not aware, would preclude an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. SHEPPARD. For the present it would.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; that can not be so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will please state the unanimous-consent agreement. The present occupant of the chair knows nothing about it.

Mr. SMOOT. By the unanimous-consent agreement asked—and I take it for granted it was consented to by the Senate—we are to consider only committee amendments, but that does not preclude an amendment to a committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is now advised of the situation. Unanimous consent was asked and granted that the committee amendments only should be considered first, and committee amendments are always amendable. So the amendment of the Senator from Utah is in order. He seeks only to amend the committee amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that the word "survey" having been inserted by a vote of the Senate, that amendment having been agreed to, it is not in order now to move to strike it out. You would have to reconsider that vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can only be stricken out after a motion to reconsider. The question is on the amendment of the committee, in line 17, to strike out "$449,700" and insert "$100,000."

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, I wish to see if I understand the motion to strike out. I understand it applies to the provisions in lines 16 and 17, "fertilizer survey of the United States, $100,000." Am I correct in that? I should like to hear from some member of the committee what survey is intended to be covered by this amendment. It may be a very important provision.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, I think there ought to be here the chairman or some member of the committee to explain these items. I agree with the Senator from Tennessee. It is not fair to the Senate to ask us to pass upon these wasteful, improvident, and unnecessary appropriations without some explanation. There is no member of the committee here. What Senator is in charge of the bill? The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has not attended any meetings. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] just informed me that he attended no meeting of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] is here.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator from Iowa does not appear to be redolent with knowledge. What member of the majority party is in charge of the bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I was called out of the Chamber temporarily, and I did not hear the inquiry of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator from Tennessee will permit me, I made the statement that it is only ordinary courtesy to the Senate that there should be some member of the Committee on Agriculture to explain these items, which to many of us appear wasteful, improvident, and unnecessary.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall be glad to give the Senator any information he may desire if I can possibly give it to him.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not hear the Senator.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I say I would be glad to furnish him with any information that I have. I am a member of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let there be order in the Chamber.

Mr. PENROSE. I hesitate to ask the Senator from Texas, because he confessed on Saturday night that he was not a member of the committee and knew nothing about the bill and was unable and unwilling to explain any details.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. PENROSE. The RECORD will show that.

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; the RECORD will not show it.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator expressed the thought that his only knowledge of the bill was contained in the paragraph relating to the prohibition rider, and he emphatically denied responsibility for the rest of the measure.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator has had an opportunity over Sunday to study the measure——

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is in error. The Senator's recollection is at fault.

Mr. PENROSE. With all the varied accomplishments of the Senator from Texas, I think the Senate is entitled to have a member of the committee here.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am a member of the committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I think I have the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. SHIELDS. I ask that this amendment may go over until some member of the committee can explain it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am a member of the committee and will be glad to give the Senator any information he may request.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to say you are not a member of the committee.

Mr. PENROSE. I thought he was not.

Mr. SHIELDS. I will ask the Senator from Texas to explain what survey is proposed by the provision in lines 16 and 17 in these words:

Fertilizer survey of the United States, $100,000.

It seems that the House provided for $449,700 for this survey. The subject matter is a very interesting one and a very important one, and the item ought not to be stricken out without a very full explanation of it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, before I proceed with the explanation I want to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that he has, I am sure unintentionally, done me an injustice. What I said Saturday evening was that I was not the chairman of the committee; and therefore had no authority to consent to the elimination of items in the bill. He has simply indulged to-day in one of his characteristic pieces of persiflage with which he entertains the Senate on numerous occasions.

The Department of Agriculture has the following to say on the subject of food and fertilizer surveys:

Surveys have been made of (a) quantities of raw food products on farms, (b) stocks in the hand of manufacturing, storing, and wholesale and retail concerns, (c) quantities of certain kinds of food preserved for home use, quantities actually on hand in the household, and estimated amounts of family consumption, and (d) fertilizing materials.

The Department of Agriculture further represents that—

(a) With the cooperation of the Bureau of Crop Estimates, information regarding stocks on farms, principally quantities of cereals and numbers of live stock, including poultry, were obtained as of August 31, 1917.

The department says further that a more comprehensive survey was made as of December 31, 1917.

Furthermore, the department represents that—

(b) For commercial concerns, a preliminary survey covering 18 items was made under date of August 31, 1917, and a more comprehensive survey, covering 86 items, under date of December 31, 1917.

The department says that—

Schedules were sent out by mail to all concerns whose names and addresses could be ascertained. In connection with the more comprehensive survey, 500,000 schedules had been returned by the end of February.

It says further——

Mr. SHIELDS. Do I understand that relates to fertilizer or merely food?

Mr. SHEPPARD. It relates to food and fertilizer. It includes both.

Mr. SHIELDS. I suppose the Senator will reach the point applicable to fertilizer in his reading.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I will. I want to give full information on this point, inasmuch as it has been requested. The department says:

Special surveys of retail establishments were made by personal canvass in 41 representative counties, including cities of all sizes, for the purpose of obtaining complete returns from such establishments in these representative communities. The information obtained in this way is being used to check by comparison the returns received by mail and to furnish a basis for estimating the holdings of very small concerns whose names and addresses generally could not be ascertained.

The department further states that—

(c) Surveys have been undertaken and are approaching completion by placing more than 40,000 schedules in the hands of representative families in the various States, requesting information concerning the preservation, uses, holdings, and consumption of foods in the household as a basis for making estimates for the 22,000,000 families of the entire country. A separate dietary survey is under way for the purpose of collecting detailed information from a large number of families at all seasons of the year in order to show food habits and customs, food waste and consumption, and the use of food according to its nutritive value.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator is speaking of the fertilizer survey?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am speaking of the food and fertilizer survey of the United States.

Mr. PENROSE. But the food survey is eliminated.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand. It was my impression, however, that information was wanted on this entire item. I am now approaching the fertilizer phase.

Mr. PENROSE. The interesting recital about food partakes a little of a variety of camouflage, it seems to me, because the committee has not been impressed by the argument of the department and has eliminated the food survey. Now, unless fertilizers are used on food I think it would be well if the Senator would confine himself to fertilizers.

Mr. SHIELDS. I understand the Senator from Texas is reading the explanation given by the Agricultural Department as to the entire item as it appears in the bill as passed by the House.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am.

Mr. SHIELDS. And he will come to the part applicable to the fertilizers in a few minutes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was just about to take up the fertilizer phase, when the Senator from Pennsylvania appeared upon the scene. The department says that—

(d) A fertilizer survey was made showing the stocks on hand of 26 items of important fertilizer material as of October 1, 1917.

Further food surveys should be made and monthly reports obtained regarding important items of food, such as wheat, flour, corn, beans, sugar, pork products, potatoes, etc., held by leading classes of concerns, especially manufacturers storages, and large wholesale establishments, in order to secure information necessary to formulate policies regarding the conservation of foods and the encouragement of production. Dietary surveys should be completed and additional fertilizer surveys be provided for.

That is the recommendation of the department. It has already made a survey of the fertilizers on hand, of 26 items of important fertilizing materials, on October 1, 1917.

Mr. PENROSE. But if I may be permitted, Mr. President, how does the Senator arrive at these figures? They all seem to be split up in a mysterious way. For instance, I find for "food and fertilizer surveys, $449,700." Why did they not make it a half million dollars at once? How do they come to pennies?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have here detailed statements as to how the money is expended.

Mr. PENROSE. I have no doubt they have provided for the expenditure of the money; but what I want to get at is how these figures are arrived at.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I shall gladly tell the Senator. For instance——

Mr. PENROSE. There is a mysterious split of the figures which I do not quite understand. Why the appropriation should be just $720 extra in the item for grain, hay, feed, and seed? Why should it not be $180,700? There is such a mathematical and wonderful accuracy in these figures that I am a little puzzled to know how they were arrived at. Does the Senator from Texas know?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I was just about to give the Senator detailed estimates.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, anyone can read the report; but I supposed the Senator was so familiar with the matter that he could tell the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Why, Mr. President, it is impossible to recollect the various details of these expenditures.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, how were the figures "720" arrived at, which are almost too insignificant to bother with in an Agricultural or in any other appropriation bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. To what particular item is the Senator from Pennsylvania referring now?

Mr. PENROSE. I am referring to the item which the Senator is discussing, right in front of him, on line 16—"grain, hay, feeds, and seed," which was originally put at $180,720. It is a mystery to many of us on this side of the Chamber, and perhaps on the other, how the $720 was arrived at.

Mr. SHEPPARD. If the Senator will allow me, I shall endeavor to explain it.

Mr. PENROSE. I hope the Senator from Texas will do so.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The department asked for $280,186 for the fiscal year of 1919, stating that this sum should be expended as follows: One specialist at $3,780; one assistant at $2,400; another assistant at $2,220; another at $1,500; two clerks at $1,800; another clerk at $1,680; five clerks at $1,620; five clerks at $1,400; one clerk at $1,320; 26 clerks at $1,200; 40 clerks at $1,100; 74 clerks at $1,000; 53 clerks, messengers, and telephone operators, $900 to $420; 1 multigraph operator, $1,200; another at $1,000; and 140 miscellaneous clerks; the total being $280,186, which the department estimated would be needed for salaries. Then follow specifications for the remainder of the estimate.

What standard or what methods the House committee followed in fixing the amount at $180,720, of course I do not know, but I give the Senator the figures, showing how the department arrived at the original estimate as to what it thought would be required for the fiscal year 1919.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I do.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from Texas mean to state that under the item "Market news service on grain, hay, feeds, and seeds," which calls for an appropriation of some two hundred and odd thousand dollars, the number of employees just stated by the Senator was required?

Mr. SHEPPARD. No; I am speaking now of the item of food and fertilizer survey. I can give the Senator the estimate as to the employees in the market news service on grain, hay, feed, and seeds if he desires.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I shall be glad to have that information. But does the Senator mean to state that of this appropriation for food and fertilizer surveys of the United States of $449,700, more than $200,000 of it is to be consumed in paying the clerks? In other words, we appropriate four hundred and some odd thousand dollars, and more than half of it is to be consumed in paying the clerks and other employees?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is the estimate of the department.

Mr. KING. Well, I think if that is the method of appropriation it ought to be revised, and somebody else ought to furnish information as a basis for the drafting of bills and the making of appropriations than those who have supplied this information to the Senate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The department states how many clerks it desires for the work and how much is to be paid each one. What else would the Senator want?

Mr. KING. Well, it would seem that, in order to expend this two hundred and odd thousand dollars, there are needed not only a few but scores of clerks.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Well, these clerks are required in order to make the survey; they perform the bulk of the work.

Mr. KING. What is the amount appropriated for the employees furnished under the preceding item?

Mr. SHEPPARD. The total amount is $88,480.

Mr. KING. Out of the $180,000?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes; that is true.

Mr. SHIELDS. That applies to feeds and seeds, but not to food and fertilizer.

Mr. KING. That refers to the market news service on grain, hay, feeds, and seeds; that is, to furnish the market news service on feeds and seeds—grain and hay having been stricken out—it costs $80,000 for clerk hire.

Mr. SHEPPARD. About 63 clerks are required under that item of $88,000.

Mr. SHIELDS. That is not the item under consideration; the item under consideration is the appropriation of $100,000 for the survey of fertilizers.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Utah is simply inquiring about the preceding item in connection with an inquiry regarding this. The department has filed a very detailed estimate as to what it needs and has also given a statement as to what it has done and what it intends to do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas advise the Senate as to how much was appropriated for this purpose in the general Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. For this item I do not think any amount is carried in the general appropriation bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I am not positive as to whether or not it was in that bill, but I think there has been a general appropriation made for this purpose every year for years past.

Mr. SHEPPARD. At any rate, the theory of this bill is that it is carrying out the emergency food-production act of last year, which was in addition and supplementary to the general Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from Utah has probably confused with the general appropriation bill the special food-survey bill that was passed last August, which did make provision for this survey.

Mr. SMOOT. Can the Senator say how much the appropriation amounted to in that general food-survey bill?

Mr. GORE. My recollection is it was something like $700,000, but I am not certain.

Mr. SMOOT. That is as I remember it. I thought it was $750,000; but it does seem to me that that is all the money that ought to be expended for that purpose. It looks to me as though we were going crazy on the expenditure of money.

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is for the Senate to say.

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is true; I think the Senator is correct in saying that, and I think the Senate ought to strike out this item of the bill, because there is already appropriated seven hundred thousand and some odd dollars for this very purpose. It is a waste of money.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that the appropriation has undoubtedly been exhausted. The survey was made as of August 31 of last year and also December 31, and this appears to be a continuing reiteration of surveys. I think there is some force in the proposition that the fertilizer supply ought to be kept in sight and that the department ought to do what it can to see that the supply is ample. That is the view of the committee.

Mr. SHIELDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma what sort of a survey of fertilizers and foods is to be made?

Mr. GORE. I assume that it is to ascertain the location of all of the principal ingredients entering into fertilizer, and to bring that location to the attention of those who are interested in the manufacture of it or who are interested in obtaining it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The object of the survey is to show the stocks of fertilizer on hand and where they are located.

Mr. SHIELDS. I presume it is not intended to ascertain as to the constituent elements of fertilizer, because it would not reach that at all; but if it is the intention to ascertain the quantities of commercial fertilizer available for use and on hand in the United States it is a very wise provision, and ought to be kept in the bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The language used by the department is this:

> A fertilizer survey was made showing the stocks on hand of 26 items of important fertilizer material as of October 1, 1917.

Mr. SMOOT. That survey has already been made.

Mr. SHEPPARD. A survey has already been made; and the department now recommends that additional fertilizer surveys be provided for.

Mr. SMOOT. Do I understand, then, that the Senator contends that we have got to make a survey every year of the amount of fertilizer on hand?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I make no contention. I am simply giving what the department says about it.

Mr. SHIELDS. The fertilizer is exhausted every year, and the users of the fertilizers are to be kept informed, and so an annual survey ought to be made.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. SHIELDS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like for my own information to inquire if this survey is not for the purpose of discovering the source of all supplies of fertilizer?

Mr. SHEPPARD. And materials for fertilizer; where they are located.

Mr. VARDAMAN. And also the amount already manufactured, is it not?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Exactly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. And the source of the supply of the fertilizers of the country?

Mr. SHEPPARD. That is true.

Mr. VARDAMAN. It seems to me that it is very necessary, and that it ought to be done. The yield of the crops depends very largely upon the amount of fertilizer used, and the necessity for the crop all will admit.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, as I understand, this appropriation is not only for the purpose of investigating the supply but also for ascertaining the price at which fertilizers are being sold, so as to determine whether the consumers of fertilizer are being oppressed or whether there is any extortion being practiced on them, for the supply will more or less control the price.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator will remember that there was a revolving fund provided for by Congress for the purpose of enabling the Government to purchase fertilizer and fertilizer contents. I presume the Government has been expending that money as rapidly as it can, and is furnishing fertilizer wherever it is required. There is no question, Mr. President, that a survey was made, as stated in the report of the Agricultural Department. That was less than a year ago; and to make an appropriation now for another survey, when they know exactly how much fertilizer there is on hand, seems to me an absolute waste of money. The Secretary of Agriculture does not say that this proposed appropriation is to ascertain where the ingredients of fertilizer are located or where they can be obtained as raw material, but the survey is to ascertain the amount of fertilizer there is in the country. Such a survey has already been made; and I repeat that it is a waste of money to appropriate any money at this time for that purpose.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It says "items of fertilizer material."

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but that means the items that are on hand that go into fertilizer.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does not that mean the raw materials of which fertilizer is made?

Mr. SMOOT. A proper survey ought to ascertain where the ingredients are produced, and whether they can be produced in this country or not, whether found in the shape of phosphate rock, or whether they are manufactured by means of chemical processes.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that already in the past two years there have been discovered, because of such investigations as are in part provided for here, great opportunities for the production of potash in the western country; and the potash produced there to-day is taking the place of potash that formerly was imported, as I understand, from Germany into this country.

Mr. SMOOT. I presume the Senator refers——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. I had the floor, Mr. President, and I thought the Senator was through. I will wait until he concludes.

Mr. KENDRICK. I merely wish to add that I have no doubt that deposits of the same material can be found both in the State of Utah and in my own State, and not only would such deposits serve us well at this particular time when we are unable to get potash from other countries, but they would serve us after the war is over. In my judgment, the amount carried by the bill is a very small amount for such an investigation as is desirable.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator that this appropriation is not for that purpose at all. I presume the Searles Lake proposition is the one to which the Senator has reference.

Mr. KENDRICK. No; Mr. President, there have been erected within the past two years enormous plants for the production of potash in the western part of the State of Nebraska. Very prosperous communities which never existed before have been built up there since the discovery was made.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, everybody knows why potash is produced in Nebraska. From the water in the lakes in the western part of that State at this time, but it has been known that potash existed there for years past; and the only reason that it is made use of now is because the price of potash is so high that the process of extracting the potash from the waters there has been made profitable. If the price of potash was the same to-day as it was several years ago those waters would be there just as they have been perhaps for centuries, and the potash in them would not be extracted.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator if he intends to say that the information has been available for many years that those waters did contain potash to an extent that would permit of the commercial production of potash?

Mr. SMOOT. For many years it has been known that potash was there; but the price of potash was so low that its extraction was not justified.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, within the week I have talked to one of the manufacturers who told me in detail about the way this information was obtained. As nearly as I can gather from that and other information, little or nothing was known about the matter until within the past two or three years.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is the same with the lakes there as it is with Searles Lake. It has been known for years and years that the waters of that lake contained potash; but it has been tied up, as the Senator knows, because of the withdrawal of the land and because of the doubt as to whether the Government would give title to the lands or would hold them and leave the properties unworked until Congress passed a leasing law. Congress has passed a leasing law, and I presume by this time Searles Lake is being worked for potash.

I wish to say to the Senator that in the southeastern portion of my State potash rock has been known to exist for years, but the problem has been as to extracting it and making enough out of the process to pay expenses. To-day there is a great mill located there, and we are producing in that State, I presume, as much potash as in almost any other State in the Union. In quantity it is unlimited; and if the price remains as it is to-day four or five mills could be erected there, for there is plenty of material to furnish the work for that number of mills. There is, however, no appropriation asked for that purpose. The work is being done by private parties.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator state the price at which it is being sold?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not looked at the quotations of late, but the price is twice as high as it was a few years ago.

I wish to say that this appropriation is not for the purpose of hunting potash material; it is not to determine how it may be extracted; but it is for the purpose of ascertaining how much of the manufactured material is on hand; that is all it is for.

Mr. KENDRICK and Mr. SHIELDS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield first to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KENDRICK. I wish to correct the Senator's statement in regard to the withdrawal of lands. Nearly every foot of land included within the sand-hill lakes is now, and has been for some years, in the hands of private owners.

Mr. SMOOT. I was referring to Searles Lake. I know that the lakes in Nebraska were in private ownership.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, if the Senator from Utah will permit, if it is not true that this appropriation is intended for the purpose of making investigations concerning materials out of which fertilizer may be made?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, my information is—it may not be accurate—that it does not relate to fertilizer materials in place or in native form, unmined or unmoved from the native place, but relates to fertilizer materials that have assumed a commercial form, the ingredients and the finished product both, I assume.

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly as I understand it, and as I stated it. So far as finding out where potash is located, I will say that I think that enough potash could be extracted from the waters of Salt Lake to furnish all the fertilizer material needed in the United States. The only question is as to extracting the potash from those waters at a cost that would justify selling the fertilizer throughout the country.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, I understand the Senator to mean that these supplies are known, but the cost of extracting them is prohibitive, except under certain conditions?

Mr. SMOOT. That is exactly it, Mr. President.

Mr. SHIELDS. Then, it will be very wise to make the survey to discover deposits where the cost would not be prohibitive; but I do not understand that this appropriation is for that purpose at all.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not for that purpose.

Mr. SHIELDS. It is for the purpose of ascertaining the quantity of fertilizer now manufactured and ready for use and ready to be sold to the consumer.

Mr. SMOOT. Every fertilizer company advertises the amount of fertilizer it has on hand. There is not a retail distributer in the United States who does not know where the wholesale distributer is, and he places his orders in the same way as he has done for years past; and if the wholesaler has the stock on hand the retailer gets the fertilizer at the price agreed upon.

Mr. SHIELDS. If the Senator will allow me a suggestion right there, this is not for the benefit of the retailer or the wholesaler or the manufacturer, but it is for the benefit of the consumers, so that they may know what supply is on hand and whether or not they are paying a reasonable price.

Mr. SMOOT. The Government is now shipping fertilizer from Chile and paying for it out of the revolving fund which we appropriated a year or so ago. The Government fixes the price at which that fertilizer shall be sold.

Mr. SHIELDS. But, notwithstanding that, the price has more than doubled in the last two years.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt of that; and I will say to the Senator that nearly everything else has more than doubled in price; and this commodity has advanced perhaps in no greater proportion than has everything else in this country.

Mr. SHIELDS. It has advanced so that it is hardly possible to use it any longer.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	Martin	Shafroth
Beckham	Henderson	Myers	Sheppard
Borah	Hitchcock	Nelson	Shields
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	New	Simmons
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Colt	Kellogg	Overman	Smoot
Culberson	Kendrick	Penrose	Sterling
Curtis	Kenyon	Phelan	Sutherland
Fernald	King	Pittman	Swanson
Fletcher	Knox	Poindexter	Thomas
France	Lenroot	Pomerene	Thompson
Gerry	Lewis	Ransdell	Trammell
Gore	McKellar	Saulsbury	Warren

Mr. BORAH. I desire to announce the absence of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not see why the Senate should appropriate $100,000 for a thing that anybody can find out who is interested in knowing about it by spending the price of a postage stamp and writing to a fertilizer journal, and within a week he will receive the information that is asked for under this appropriation. It is simply a waste of money, for no other purpose than to send men all over the country, at the expense of the Government, to collect information that is known and collected from other sources and can be and will be gladly distributed upon request. Therefore I trust that the motion will prevail and that this item will be stricken out.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, inasmuch as the discussion is now regarding fertilizers, and I have discovered what seems to me to be the absence of a much-needed appropriation, I ask to fertilize this bill by proposing the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read and lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 3, after the figures "$52,950," on line 5, it is proposed to insert the words "and making cottage cheese off the farm, $53,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that objection is made, under the agreement, to the amendment on line 17, and therefore it will be passed over. The Secretary will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 18, after the word "conservation," to strike out "and" and insert "of," so as to read:

Conservation of food products in transportation and storage.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 19, after the word "storage," to strike out "$229,937" and insert "$204,484," so as to read:

Conservation of food products in transportation and storage, $204,484.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the figures "20," so that it will read "$4,484" instead of "$204,484."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah proposes an amendment to the amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On line 19 it is proposed to strike out "$204,484" and to insert "$4,484."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, while we are moving along on the bill I notice as I cast my eye over the Senate the presence of the chairman of the committee, which is a rarity during the discussion of the measure; and I will take advantage of his presence here to ask him the total amount that this bill carries.

Mr. GORE. Something more than $19,000,000, I believe.

Mr. PENROSE. This supplemental bill?

Mr. GORE. I think so; yes, sir.

Mr. PENROSE. And the original bill carried nearly thirty million?

Mr. GORE. About twenty-seven million.

Mr. PENROSE. Over twenty-eight million?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. Twenty-eight million dollars and nearly $20,000,000 more is nearly $50,000,000. Mr. President, three-quarters of which, I think it is gradually being shown, might just as well be poured into the gutter.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, as we recently appropriated——

Mr. PENROSE. I was coming to that point, if the Senator will permit me. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee another question. A little while ago we passed the general Agricultural bill, and only a few days ago we agreed to the report of the conferees, and it has been for some two days in the hands of the President. Hardly had we completed that act when this bill chases it along and comes out of the committee, adding another $20,000,000. Now, I am interested in finding out why these items were suddenly discovered as necessary to stimulate agriculture for the war. Why did not the committee, when they were framing the general bill, have cognizance of these other items?

Mr. GORE. I think the explanation of that is this: On August 10 last, or prior to that time, I may say, we had passed what was known as the food-survey or food-production act. I differentiate it from what is known as the food-control act. It was intended and passed as an emergency measure. Its alleged object, and I presume its real object, was to stimulate and increase production to meet the extraordinary requirements of the war. Under that special act a special organization has been erected, and special activities looking to the meeting of the emergency have been perfected. Now, it is desirable on the part of the department to keep the regular, ordinary services of the department which were administered prior to the war, and which will continue to be administered after the war, separated from these special activities. The normal and usual activities which will continue in the future, when peace returns, will be cared for under the regular appropriation. It is imagined that this bill will cease with the war, that the special activities will cease, the special appropriations will cease, and the special organization will cease; and it is, of course, desirable to keep the special organization separate from the regular organization, so that there will be some reason when the war is over to dismantle the one without interfering with the other. I can not say that I quite lay the flattering unction to my soul that all these appropriations will be discontinued when the war is over.

Mr. PENROSE. None of them will ever be discontinued unless the attention of the Senate is very forcibly called to them. They are here to stay, with a constant increase, as long as there is an appropriation bill that passes without being read by Senators.

I should like to ask the chairman of the committee why these special appropriations in this special war measure can be fairly described as relating to the war crisis. Is there anything in the situation on the western line that directly, indirectly, or remotely is connected with the investigation of the habits and practices of prairie dogs and coyotes? That is in this extra bill, and I should be very glad if the Senator would enlighten me on that point.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I really am reinspired, I may say, by the confidence of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that he imagines we can really win this war and carry our arms to triumph on the western front without devoting proper attention to the prairie dogs in Wyoming.

Mr. PENROSE. I admit that they would create disquiet on the rear, and perhaps divert the attention of the population; but in all seriousness I should like to ask the Senator why nearly a half million dollars should be spent on prairie dogs at a moment when the very last dollar is being wrung from the individual and the corporation by taxes or loans?

Mr. GORE. Of course, speaking seriously——

Mr. PENROSE. I am speaking seriously.

Mr. GORE. Yes; I appreciate that—it was the feeling of those who were back of this legislation, and who support it now, that the war creates an extraordinary demand for food.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. And that, in order to meet this demand, food production should be stimulated, conservation should be stimulated, and those agencies which destroy or interfere with the production of food should, as far as possible, be placed under control and destroyed. Now, of course, the prairie dogs have gone through many a battle in this Chamber.

Mr. PENROSE. And they are still there.

Mr. GORE. So with predatory animals, the coyote and the wolf; they are regular combatants in the gladiatorial scene which always takes place here when the Agricultural bill is under consideration. It is contended, I believe, that $100,000 worth of cattle and sheep, perhaps more, are destroyed annually by the coyote and the wolf. Now, the prairie dogs also prey on vegetation, and interfere with the production of food. That is the contention back of this appropriation; and if we can exterminate that pest, and rescue from their maws or jaws the food they now consume, that much more will be available for the Army and Navy of the United States and the allies.

Mr. PENROSE. I am not surprised that the Senator smiles as he makes his explanation, because this bill is largely a work of humor. Nearly $400,000 is appropriated to destroy these pests, who, in turn, it is alleged, destroy, at the most, $100,000 worth of food.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I yield the floor for the present.

Mr. KENDRICK. As I, in part, represent one of the Western States that is vitally interested in at least a portion of this legislation, I think it worth while to say, in answer to the Senator from Pennsylvania, that this appropriation for the destruction of predatory animals and even prairie dogs has more real merit than it would seem to have when it is made a subject for levity here in the Senate. I know personally of ranchmen in the West who have expended thousands of dollars for the destruction of both prairie dogs and predatory animals in territory over which they did not exercise any control whatever, and have done so to the benefit of themselvse and the communities around them.

The difficulty about both of these questions is found in the fact that the work of extermination can not be limited to individuals or counties or even States, because, as in the case of predatory animals, they do not confine their rovings to the borders even of the States.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. KENDRICK. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. In the same appropriation there is a large allowance doubtless for the domestication of mink and marten. Can the Senator explain how they bear relation to the war crisis?

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I have no knowledge whatever on that point.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator was starting out with apparently a very complete knowledge of everything and therefore I hazarded the inquiry.

Mr. KENDRICK. I am certainly in a position to speak upon the two points I have just mentioned—the question of predatory animals and its direct application to food production.

Mr. PENROSE. Have the mink and the marten any defender here in their relation to the western front or food production?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I merely want to say one word with regard to predatory animals.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee the question I have just propounded.

Mr. GORE. I suppose that is to encourage fur-producing animals, so as to substitute their fur as far as we can for the wool, which has soared to such a high price recently.

Mr. PENROSE. Has any estimate been made as to when the mink and marten will be so numerous as to dot every hillside and produce a crop of fur that will be appreciable in the census returns?

Mr. GORE. No; that is a process of evolution.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; evolution with an appropriation.

Mr. GORE. No one can exactly foresee the æons to come and tell just when this evolution will have been consummated.

Mr. PENROSE. Then the Senator is a little weak on mink and marten?

Mr. GORE. I am not so strong on mink and marten as I am on the predatory animals. I differentiate the predatory animals from mink and marten, and even from prairie dogs, to some extent.

Mr. PENROSE. If so, then I would move to strike out that part of the appropriation.

Mr. GORE. There can be no doubt that the appropriation for the destruction of predatory animals is a very wise appropriation. It is necessary, because the ravages of these animals amount to multiplied millions, perhaps $100,000,000, a year. Their extermination is a thing that in the years to come can be completely accomplished, and the cattleman and the sheepman can be emancipated from that threat and that destructive agency. The conservation that will result from it will be enormous, and it will be a general benefit which will be well worth the money which has been appropriated for that object. I think the prairie-dog appropriation certainly has not so many arguments in its favor. Perhaps the destruction caused by them is not so general; at least, I do not realize it to be so; but from what the Senator from Wyoming says, that appropriation is very well justified.

Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania made some reference to the fact that I was not in the Chamber. I want to say that during the morning hour I was listening to the hearings before the Interstate Commerce Committee—hearings that were insisted upon by the Senator from Pennsylvania and others yesterday. I have to report at the committee meeting now. It is meeting at 3 o'clock, and I shall be obliged to absent myself from the Chamber for a while on that account; but I trust that in my absence the prairie dog and marten and mink will continue to receive the gentle attentions of the Senator from Pennsylvania and others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on line 19, as amended.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have opposed these and similar appropriations, but without success, ever since I have been a Member of this body. I believe these appropriations are unnecessary, and I do not think they are at all beneficial, except possibly to multiply the species which is sought to be exterminated.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. KENDRICK. I just wish to say to the Senator, in regard to the predatory animals and the efforts by the Government to destroy those animals, that the agencies set up by the Federal Government have proved so efficient that in the past two or three years the authorities of some of the Western States who have been paying countless thousands of dollars in bounties for this same purpose have seriously considered a plan of increasing the efficiency of the Government by adding a State appropriation to the money appropriated by the Federal Government, so as to carry this work along in a general way instead of a local way, which is bound to be a failure. I want to say further to the Senator, in regard to that one question, that it is incumbent upon the Government to take some action because of the great territory in the West, such as Indian reservations and forest reserves, in his State and mine, over which the Government exercises almost complete and exclusive control. These territories provide breeding grounds for these animals; and if the Federal Government will not lend a hand in destroying them it is impossible for the people living in adjoining sections to get any protection whatever. Local effort is entirely fruitless.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the only argument I have ever heard which seemed to me to be a plausible one in behalf of these appropriations for the extinction of predatory animals is the fact that the Government has created large reservations over which it exercises practically exclusive jurisdiction, and that consequently it should itself exterminate the pests which are bred in these reservations, and to which the State laws, generally speaking, do not apply; but I know that in the days when bounties were offered for predatory animals, and so much was paid for every scalp—a practice which I think still prevails in the West—the animals which were the subject of the bounty seemed impossible of extermination. They constituted a constant and perpetual source of revenue for those who took advantage of the bounty laws, and who received the greater portion of the moneys designed for that purpose.

The Senator from Wyoming is much better informed with regard to the operation of this law than am I, because the subject matter of the appropriations peculiarly affects his pursuit in life; and I am going to accept his statement regarding the beneficial effect of these appropriations upon the subjects involved, because I know that what he has stated about the matter can be accepted absolutely by the Senate. I have stated here on two or three occasions, however, that the natural effect of these appropriations would be the same that is observed in the matter of the boll weevil, the potato bug, and other insectivorous life for which we appropriate millions every year, but which thrive under the appropriation. Now, the prairie dog, Mr. President, is a very attractive and interesting little animal, whose chief characteristic is that he associates underground with rattlesnakes, and between them they divide the good things of life in so far as their limited areas are concerned; and yet it is a singular fact that thus far—I suppose it will come—these appropriations do not provide for the joint extermination of the two particular inhabitants of these villages, the rattlesnake and the prairie dog. I do not know what the Government has done in Wyoming or in Utah with regard to prairie-dog extermination, but in my State the festive little animal thrives upon destructive appropriations. Evidently he is there to stay, and his boon companion, the rattlesnake, keeps him constant and unfailing company; and I think—although I state this with some hesitation, because my duties here have made it impossible for me to spend as much time as I should like in my home—I think the effect of this appropriation has been to stimulate the prairie-dog industry; and if it be necessary to legislate by money appropriations for the increase of our food production during the war, then perhaps this legislation will produce that consequence, provided the prairie dog is an edible animal. I think in all probability if this appropriation is administered as its predecessors have been, prairie-dog meat may become a staple article of diet, and Mr. Hoover will then request us to devote ourselves to that form of meat food so as to make the beef supply more available for our allies. In that sense it may be that this appropriation will produce the desired result; but while I am on my feet I want to speak about my own amendment, because I think it is quite appropriate.

I am opposed to class legislation. I have voted for it occasionally, because I have had to; but I believe in the good old Democratic doctrine of "special privileges to none and equal rights to all." Now, here is an appropriation of $52,950 for making cottage cheese on the farm. I do not see why it is necessary to encourage the making of cottage cheese on the farm. Making cottage cheese off the farm, however, is a different proposition. If we are to encourage the making of cottage cheese in this country at all, let us encourage making it off the farm, in the cities and elsewhere, and by that means add very materially to our food production. Therefore I have offered an amendment providing for an appropriation of $53,000 for making cottage cheese off the farm. Apart from the fact that that relieves this appropriation from the charge of being class legislation, we make it universal; and if it be true that he blesses the world who makes two blades of grass grow where only one blade grew before, then think what a great benefit my amendment will confer upon the world, if it establishes the making of cottage cheese off the farm.

I hope, Mr. President, that when we reach that amendment in due course it will be unanimously adopted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator how far off the farm it must be made?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, that reminds me of the old quotation:

Thou art so near, and yet so far!

If it is off the farm I do not think the authorities should discriminate as to distance. I have no doubt that the matter may become the subject of a number of technical rules of a department which will determine what is cottage cheese on the farm and what is cottage cheese off the farm; but if we particularize too much ourselves, I am afraid that we may invite the very difficulty which is suggested by the question of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether he has any remote notion as to what would result from an investigation of cottage cheese? What is the objective or the purpose of investigating cottage cheese?

Mr. THOMAS. This is not the investigating of cottage cheese; it is the making of cottage cheese.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well; it is the same thing.

Mr. THOMAS. The result of the investigation would depend upon the age of the cheese.

Mr. PENROSE. Are new purposes to be discovered by a variety of manufacture, or what is wrong with the way it has been made for 10,000 years?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I can not answer that question, because I had nothing to do with the insertion of this clause. My only concern is to rob it of the imputation of being class legislation and to extend its benefits to the making of cottage cheese off the farm as well as cottage cheese on the farm. I may say that I offered that amendment when the Senator was temporarily absent from the Chamber.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator think the appropriation is large enough for this important purpose?

Mr. THOMAS. I made mine a little larger. I made mine $53,000, first, because I believe in round numbers, and, second, because I think the disadvantages attending making cottage cheese off the farm are such that it is a few hundred dollars to the bad as compared with making cottage cheese on the farm.

Mr. PENROSE. That seems reasonable.

Mr. THOMAS. I thought I would convince the Senator from Pennsylvania, if I failed in other directions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES of New Mexico in the chair). The question is on the amendment as amended. Without objection, it is agreed to.

Mr. KING. May the Secretary please report the amendment?

The SECRETARY. The amendment just agreed to is in line 19, to strike out "$204,484" and to insert "$4,484."

Mr. KING. I have an amendment to offer to the next paragraph, when that shall be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the amendment of the Senator from Utah was adopted, and now the question is on adopting the amendment as amended.

Mr. KING. I beg the Chair's pardon.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is, in line 22, to strike out "$2,136,028" and insert "$1,610,155," so as to read "in all, $1,610,155."

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to know whether the words "survey of the United States, $449,700," were stricken out?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That item went over by request.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This is an amendment to strike out "$2,136,028" and substitute "$1,610,155," and it covers several items such as city market service, $66,131; direct market activities, $85,100; special market activities, $109,440. Is there anyone who can inform me what direct market activities are as distinguished from special market activities?

Mr. KING. I was just going to state to the Senator that I shall submit a motion at the proper time to strike out each of those items.

Mr. PENROSE. It seems to me the Senator on a little reflection will see that that is a very excellent reason for getting an additional appropriation by a different name.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, I realize that those items are not a committee amendment, and it may not be strictly in order now to vote upon them; but they are a part of the total of $2,136,000, which the committee amendment proposes to reduce to $1,610,000. Therefore I thought it was pertinent to inquire what is meant by that language. It seems to me when we are taxing the people to the extent we are the Senate ought to know something about what these sums are and what the purposes are for which they are appropriating these sums and taxing the people. There is no word of explanation about it at all.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield.

Mr. KENDRICK. As the Senator from Pennsylvania has well said, it seems a pity that some member of the committee can not be present and explain these items in detail. I regret that I am not better informed, but it is my impression from experience with such things myself, and from a good deal of agitation on this particular subject, that the object to be served here is to bring to the consumers of products better information and better facilities for securing the products of the farm and of the ranch than are to be had at the present time.

There has been for some years a strong protest against a situation that increases so materially the prices of products to the consumer, as compared to the prices received by the producer, and undoubtedly these items are intended to serve the purpose of bringing the producer and consumer nearer together.

For the information of the Senator from Connecticut, I will say that there is now a strong movement on foot to establish in all the cities of the country at the largest consuming points municipal markets for all kinds of meat products, for the purpose of eliminating at least a part of the well-known excessive cost that is levied upon the consumer by the middlemen. I am not opposed to the middleman in his activities, I will say; but this question has been agitated, and there is an increasing effort to bring about a reform in that situation. I am persuaded that these items are intended to cover that point.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, Mr. President, that is just a sample of the way we are legislating. Here is a great supply bill, an appropriation bill, and when a Senator is asked for what purpose the three items to which I have called attention, aggregating $260,671, as I figure it, over a quarter of a million dollars is to be devoted, the Senator says he assumes and presumes thus and so. The language of the bill allows the department to do anything they have a mind to do with the money. It does not limit them to any purpose whatever. They can say for direct market activities or for special market activities. They can do anything they want with the money. It is not wise legislation, and it ought not to appear here before the Senate from any committee that has not given it careful consideration.

That is all I have to say about it. Of course I know it will pass, but it is not my idea of a proper performance of our duties to pass items of that kind in this way and under this information.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. KING addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The senior Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think it is almost a farce to try to consider a $19,000,000 appropriation bill as this bill has been considered this afternoon. It is nearly 4 o'clock, and I think if Senators who are interested in this bill will not stay in the Chamber and it is not possible for us to keep a quorum here the Senate ought to adjourn and wait until a time when we can take up the bill and have Senators here.

Mr. KING. I will say to my colleague that that is the purpose for which I just addressed the Chair. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Will the Senator allow me to state the explanation the department gives of these three items?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can do that to-morrow.

Mr. KING. I suggest to the Senator, if it meets his approval, he can do that to-morrow when more Senators will be present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Utah moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, July 10, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, July 9, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D, offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, our Father in heaven, for the law of compensation which follows the abnormal upheavals, physically, mentally, morally, in the course of human events. Hence, we confidently look forward to a readjustment of the political, social, and religious conditions when the war, which has shaken the world from center to circumference, shall have passed into history through a victory for right; when shams shall give way to the genuine, royalty shall be recognized by character, nobility by nobility of soul, and religion by a life hid in Thee; when all men shall be recognized as sons of the living God; in the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ESCH. To prefer a request. I ask unanimous consent for an indefinite leave of absence for my colleague, Mr. DAVIDSON, on account of sickness.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WHITE of Maine. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WHITE of Maine. I desire to ask unanimous consent for five weeks' leave of absence for Mr. GOODALL, on account of illness.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent for five weeks' leave of absence for his colleague, Mr. GOODALL, on account of sickness. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

SHIPPING LEGISLATION—CONFERENCE.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12099 and ask unanimous consent to disagree to the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12099, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire what the subject matter of this bill is.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is the bill we passed recently giving the President power to commandeer ships and regulate ocean freight rates.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Speaker announced the following conferees: Mr. ALEXANDER, Mr. HARDY, Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia, Mr. EDMONDS, and Mr. HADLEY.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, July 8, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker of the House.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I request leave of absence for one week to attend to personal business.

Very truly, yours, (Signed) ALBERT F. POLK.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES SUBJECT TO MILITARY DUTY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of Commerce, in response to House resolution 380, which communication was read, and with the accompanying list ordered printed in the RECORD and to lie on the Speaker's table:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, July 8, 1918.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
Speaker House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with House resolution No. 380, of June 3, 1918, I submit herewith statement showing the total number of employees of the Department of Commerce who were on January 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31 years and for whom request for exemption from military duty or for deferred classification has been asked by the department and allowed.

The statement gives the name and home address of each person, the character of work he is performing, and the length of time of such service. The principal reason for the action of the department in each case is given, with general explanations respecting each service.

The total number of employees of the department is approximately 10,000. In two services—the Bureau of the Census and the Steamboat-Inspection Service—no exemptions or deferred classifications have been asked. In the case of the Bureau of Navigation but one has been asked. The facts respecting the other five services are given in detail. In no case has exemptions or deferred classification been asked for any of the clerical staff except in so far as the chief clerk of the lighthouse depot at Tompkinsville, N. Y., engaged on naval work, may be considered such.

The statement for each bureau shows the total force subject to draft, the number entering military service, and those for whom deferred classification or exemption has been requested.

The statements under the heading of each service give the particular circumstances respecting that service.

Yours, very truly,
WILLIAM C. REDFIELD,
Secretary.

STATEMENT AS TO EMPLOYEES OF THE DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE FOR WHOM CLAIMS FOR EXEMPTION OR DEFERRED CLASSIFICATION IN CONNECTION WITH ARMY DRAFT HAVE BEEN MADE AND ALLOWED.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY.

Out of an approximate number of 172 employees in the office of the Secretary, 16 have left for service in the Army or Navy. Of those now in the office, 20 are within the draft age, but no claims for exemption or deferred classification have been made.

BUREAU OF THE CENSUS.

The expert statistical force of this bureau has rendered considerable assistance to the Provost Marshal General in connection with the Army draft and is now cooperating with other branches of the service in statistical work.

It has an office force of 638. Sixty employees have left for service in the Army or Navy. Forty-nine of its present employees are within the draft age, but no claims for exemption or deferred classification have been made.

STEAMBOAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

Extra duties have been devolved upon the personnel of this service by the examination of the increased number of candidates or officers for the enlarged merchant marine and other additional work in connection with the inspection of vessels being constructed and the materials used therein.

Out of a force of approximately 320 employees, 24 have left for service in the Army or Navy. Nineteen of its present employees are within the draft age. No claims for exemption or deferred classification have been made.

BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC SERVICE.

Since the beginning of the war the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce has been the central information office for export and import statistics of the United States, for export and import statistics of foreign countries, for reports on the raw-material situation, the shipping situation, Government control of exports and imports, and similar important subjects of interest with reference to foreign countries. The United States Shipping Board, the War Trade Board, the Food Administration, the Fuel Administration, the Naval Consulting Board, the Military Intelligence Branch of the War Department, and other organizations engaged in war work have made constant demands on the bureau for economic and statistical information with reference to exports and imports, commodities, and foreign countries. The commercial-attaché service and the commercial agents, special agents, and trade commissioners of the bureau in foreign countries have been engaged largely in making investigations and reports on matters of war importance, particularly reports on the trade in important commodities. In addition to its statistical publications, the bureau has issued reports on Germany's foreign-trade organization, German trade and the war, reconstruction in France, and has published currently in its daily paper economic and trade reports and discussions of legislation having war significance.

Only six deferred classifications have been recommended of the entire staff in Washington, these recommendations referring only to men doing responsible administrative work; only four deferred classifications recommended for men in our district-office service, all four being trained men on responsible work; and the remaining recommendations all having reference to men in the foreign service who were appointed because of their special university and other qualifications for foreign service, and who could only be replaced with the greatest difficulty, with loss of time and efficiency, and at a substantial expense.

Eliot G. Mears, 3708 Patterson Street, Chevy Chase, D. C. Length of service: 2 years 11 months. Character of work and reason for claim: In direct charge of administrative work connected with the 11 foreign offices of the commercial-attaché service. Specialized education in business administration and years of administrative experience. Persons of equal qualifications and training not available.

Oliver C. Moles, 2607 Eleventh Street NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 3 years 2 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Expert in foreign trade-marks and on patent and trade-mark laws in foreign countries; good linguist; assistant chief of division. Persons with like qualifications very rare. Work would be seriously curtailed if the bureau lost his services.

Lynn W. Meekins, 109 Waverly Place, New York City. Length of service: 1 year 8 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Commercial agent in New York office of the bureau. The only trained man available for special work in that office. Good linguist, report writer; would require long training to replace him; all other agents of same type have entered military service. His withdrawal from the work would detract considerably from the value of the office at this time.

Paul J. Croghan, 1719 Willard Street NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 3 years and 9 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Assistant Chief of Trade Information Section. Thoroughly conversant with activities of the bureau and with sources of trade information throughout the country. Could not be replaced except by man with similar extensive experience; none available.

Harvey W. Haun, 1714 U Street NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 6 years and 7 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Chief of Auditing Division. Impossible at the present time to obtain men with a knowledge of Government methods of handling accounts, and separation of Mr. Haun with his experience would throw that branch of the work in great confusion. Failed to pass physical examination on first quota of draft.

Charles E. Herring, 1775 California Street NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 4 years and 4 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Chief of Division of Commercial Agents. Directing work of special investigators in this country and abroad. Linguist and trade expert. Separation of Mr. Herring would interfere seriously with investigations being made in foreign countries.

Thomas L. Gaukel, 3545 Thirteenth Street NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 3 years and 7 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Assistant Chief of Division of District Offices. Expert in district-office management. About to be assigned to bureau's office at Chicago, Ill.

John F. Hurst, American Embassy, Petrograd, Russia. Length of service: 1 year and 2 months Character of work and reason for claim: Secretary to commercial attaché at Petrograd, Russia. Practically impossible to find a man with his knowledge of European languages and experience in consular-office work who would be available for a position at the salary laid down.

Harold E. Everley, in South America traveling. Lenth of service: 1 year and 3 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Special agent investigating furniture markets in South America. If recalled would necessitate postponement of the investigation, the result of which is awaited with interest by manufacturers, as men of like qualifications could not easily be obtained; it took several months for bureau to find a man with proper equipment—Mr. Everley, who had had South American experience.

Arthur L. Hill, 1400 East Fifty-third Street, Chicago, Ill. Length of service: 2 years and 7 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Just returned from bureau work in Japan. Assistant to commercial agent in charge of Chicago office. Experienced in bureau and district-office work. About to be transferred to Washington as assistant to the chief of the Division of District Offices.

Norman L. Anderson, in foreign service at Christiania, Norway. Length of service: 1 year and 10 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Commercial agent at Christiania, Norway. Few suitable men available with knowledge of Scandinavian languages. Very desirable that Mr. Anderson should carry on the important work on which engaged; formerly in Army, was released for this very important mission.

John F. Butler, in foreign service at Paris, France. Length of service: 3 years and 8 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Clerk to commercial attaché at Paris, France. Experienced in work, been abroad for two years, services most valuable at present time and impossible to replace him without material loss to trade promotion interests; doing much war work in present capacity.

Axel H. Oxholm, in foreign service, traveling in Scandinavian countries. Length of service: 1 year and 7 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Special agent investigating markets for American lumber in Scandinavian countries. Knowledge of Scandinavian languages and experience in lumber trade. His recall would curtail investigation seriously and would involve a considerable waste of money spent.

T. O. Klath, 318 West Fifty-seventh Street, New York City. Length of service: 1 year 9 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Commercial agent in charge of the bureau's sample exhibit room at New York. Exhibit comprises samples of foreign-made goods collected at considerable expense throughout the world; requires a man with extensive bureau experience.

Paul L. Edwards, The Hague, Netherlands. Length of service: 3 years 6 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Commercial attaché at The Hague, Netherlands. Experienced in commercial attaché work. Because of his knowledge of foreign languages and his familiarity with conditions in Germany and the Netherlands since the outbreak of the war it is believed that he could not be replaced by any other man who would handle the work as he is now doing it. Only because of unusual equipment that such a young man appointed to such an important post. Doing much war work.

Lew B. Clark, in foreign service at Buenos Aires, Argentina. Length of service: 3 years. Character of work and reason for claim: Clerk to commercial attaché at Buenos Aires, Argentina. Considerable experience in South America, speaking Spanish like a native, and is of great value to bureau because of his qualifications and experience. He could be replaced with great difficulty.

Herman G. Brock, 2304 Woodridge Street NE., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 3 years 2 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Special agent making special commercial investigations in foreign countries. Has been investigating markets for American goods in South America for the past year and a half. Owing to his unusual language equipment (French, German, Spanish, Italian, and Portuguese) and his experience in South America and in district office work, his training renders him peculiarly valuable to the bureau. About to be sent to England to make commercial investigations and assist in war work.

Paul M. La Rose, 5015 Cabanne Avenue, St. Louis, Mo. Length of service: 2 years 11 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Commercial agent in charge of district office at St. Louis. By reason of experience the district work would be seriously hampered if his services were withdrawn; one of very few young men left in our district-office service, others having enlisted or been drafted.

Deferred classification was asked for 18 out of a total force of 175; 7 of the 18 are in service abroad.

The service has thus far lost 26 men in the draft from its Washington office alone.

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

One of the bureau's vessels, the Dixie, has been turned over to the Navy Department.

Eighteen members of the radio inspection force of this bureau have been transferred to the Army or Navy. A substitute radio service has been organized, and it is now conducting in five centers schools where radiotelegraphy is being taught without charge to those who desire to enter the military service of the United States as radio operators. No claims for exemption have been made for the force of this bureau, and only one claim for deferred classification, that of—

Arthur Batcheller, 103 Belvedere Street, Boston, Mass. Length of service: 1 year 3 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Radio inspector in charge of Boston office. Conducting an evening school.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

A mere pro forma tabulation of those in the Coast and Geodetic Survey for whom deferred classification has been asked and granted without some explanation of how this bureau is peculiarly an adjunct of both arms of the military service under normal conditions and how essential are the results of its work to the Army and the Navy in the present emergency would be both misleading and unfair to the bureau. The personnel of the bureau is composed generally of persons of technical training along lines that require university education for admission and considerable experience after admission before they become proficient.

Such are the special qualifications of these technical men that Congress has provided legislation whereby, in time of national emergency, the President is authorized to transfer and commission them in the Army and the Navy. Under this authorization more than 70 of these technically qualified men have been transferred to the Army and the Navy by Executive order. Also, five vessels of the bureau with their crews have been transferred to the Navy Department by Executive order.

The withdrawal of so many of the technical employees of the bureau would be of little significance if the activities of the bureau could in this measure be decreased, but the bureau is still under weighty obligations to the Navy, the merchant marine, and even the Army in the matter of supplying navigation charts and in making emergency surveys. The bureau is responsible for the production of charts of the coasts of the United States and all outlying possessions. Further, the Navy has called upon the bureau for important confidential military surveys, and the Army has required special geodetic work as a basis for military maps of certain regions of our country.

To fulfill these war obligations the remaining technical personnel of the bureau, augmented from time to time by new employees as those properly qualified could be found, has been diligently employed, and it has been only for the purpose of saving to the bureau these technically qualified employees that the claim for deferred classification has been exercised.

For these reasons claims for deferred classification have been made for the following:

H. W. Hemple, 2326 South 60 Court, Cicero, Ill. Length of service: 9 months.

F. L. Gallen, Coast and Geodetic Survey. Length of service: 9 months.

Character of work and reason for claim: Deck officers. Engaged on wire-drag work at request of Navy Department. Deck officers come to the bureau through an exacting civil-service examination and must have university training before they are admitted to the examination.

Joe Belmont, Coast and Geodetic Survey. Length of service: 10 months.

E. Hanson, Coast and Geodetic Survey. Length of service: 1 year 1 month.

Character of work and reason for claim: Seamen. Seamen on survey vessels are also used as rodmen, leadsmen, etc. Experience necessary. If serving in merchant marine deferred classification would be granted.

Holger Simonsen, Coast and Geodetic Survey steamer Patterson, Seattle, Wash. Length of service: 1 year 2 months. Character of work: Quartermaster on steamer Patterson.

S. Sandelius, Coast and Geodetic Survey steamer Patterson, Seattle, Wash. Length of service: 4 years 1 month. Character of work: Boatswain, steamer Patterson.

Addison Kilgore, Coast and Geodetic Survey steamer Patterson, Seattle, Wash. Length of service: 1 year 2 months.

Fred Moe, steamer Explorer, Seattle, Wash. Length of service: 2 years 2 months.

James F. Gilbert, steamer Explorer, Seattle, Wash. Length of service: 5 years 1 month. Character of work: Assistants to engineer, steamers Patterson and Explorer.

M. Dean Graves, steamer Patterson, Seattle, Wash. Length of service: 9 months. Character of work: Chief writer, steamer Patterson.

E. Dahlstrom, steamer Patterson, Seattle, Wash. Length of service: 6 years 3 months. Character of work: Chief carpenter's mate, steamer Patterson.

Reasons for claim: Deferred classification in these cases were requested by reason of special qualifications and experience. If they were serving in the merchant marine they could obtain deferred classification.

Kenneth Reynolds, 424 East Capitol Street, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 3 years 6 months.

Wm. Evans Johnson, Apartment 24, The Alamo, 1233 Twelfth Street NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 8 years.

Samuel L. Rosenberg, 1705 Sixth Street NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 6 years 2 months.

Charles P. Geyer, 1128 East North Avenue, Baltimore, Md. Length of service: 1 year 2 months.

Frank B. Gehring, Jackson Avenue, near Montana Avenue, Raspeburg, Md. Length of service: 1 year 2 months.

H. S. Coe, 1838 Second Street NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 7 years 9 months.

John Mewes, 109 Pennsylvania Avenue NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year 1 month.

John H. Buscher, Good Hope, Anacostia Station, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year 1 month.

Thomas J. A. Shea, jr., 94 Bates Street, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 4 years 6 months.

Gilbert Fayette Winslow, 103 Maryland Avenue NE., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 5 years 10 months.

Orland P. Sutherland, 1811 Wyoming Avenue, apartment 32, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year 10 months.

Nathaniel Pendleton White, St. Paul Street, Kensington, Md. Length of service: 3 years 4 months.

Walter D. Sutcliffe, 435 Tenth Street NE., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 4 years 11 months.

Joseph Zucker, 412 Eleventh Street NE., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year 9 months.

Character of work and reasons for claim: These men are draftsmen, lithographic transferers, pressmen, computers, etc., engaged in the several branches connected with computations for and production of maps and charts for the use of the Army, Navy, and mercantile marine. Their withdrawal from the work would seriously delay the same.

Frank Neumann, Honolulu Magnetic Observatory, post-office box 48, Ewa, Oahu, Hawaii. Length of service: 7 years 2 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Magnetic observer in charge of observatory near Honolulu. His withdrawal would result in a serious break in the observatory record, which has been continuous since 1902.

G. E. Maddox, steamer Explorer, Seattle, Wash. Length of service, 1 year 10 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Radio operator, steamer Explorer. If deferred classification were refused Mr. Maddox, he could enlist in the merchant-marine service and there obtain same.

E. Duvall Bromley, Coast and Geodetic Survey, Washington. Length of service: 1 year 1 month. Character of work and reason for claim: Observer in charge of field party. His withdrawal would seriously injure the work.

BUREAU OF FISHERIES.

The Bureau of Fisheries has turned over to the Navy Department four of its vessels, and is aiding in the war by special efforts to increase the use of fish as food by adding to the classes of fish accepted as such and by promoting the distribution and marketing of the same. It is also endeavoring to bring about a reduction in the price of fish hitherto wasted and to utilize waste products in the production of oil, fish feed, and fertilizers, also the extension of leather manufacture from fish skins.

Clarence A. Anderson, Seattle, Wash. Length of service: 1 year 1 month. Character of work and reason for claim: Instructing fishermen in the Pacific Coast States and in Alaska in the best methods of curing fish and in promoting effective cooperation between fishermen, dealers, and distributors. Deferred classification asked on account of his special knowledge of the important work of preserving fish as food. Work requested by governor of Alaska.

Harry J. Christoffers, London, Wis. Length of service: 7 years 10 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Engaged in promoting the use of neglected aquatic food products and expanding the production of aquatic leathers; miscellaneous work in connection with the fur-seal fisheries. Deferred classification asked on account of his services being needed on the Pribilof Islands and his special knowledge and experience in connection with the work there.

Donald R. Crawford, Key West, Fla. Length of service: 1 year 1 month. Character of work and reason for claim: Instructing fishermen and packers in the proper methods of preserving fish as food and in the investigation of problems affecting the food supply in various waters of the Gulf of Mexico.

James S. Gutsell, Ithaca, N. Y. Length of service: 1 year 8 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Investigations and experiments for the guidance of oyster planters, and for the production of an increased supply of food from coastal waters. Special knowledge and training for the work in which he is engaged.

Joseph Kemmerich, Blaine, Wash. Length of service: 9 years 7 months. Character of work and reason for claim: In charge of the Baker Lake (Wash.) fish hatchery. Special training in the particular branch of fish culture in which he is engaged.

Austin F. Shira, Fairport, Iowa. Length of service: 7 years 8 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Superintendent of the Fairport Laboratory, the work of which is, as a whole, directed to the increase of fish-food supplies from inland waters. Deferred classification requested on account of his experience and knowledge of fish culture and the utilization of fishery products.

William P. Studdart, Seattle, Wash. Length of service: 1 year 1 month. Character of work and reason for claim: Instructing fishermen in the Pacific Coast States and in Alaska in the best methods of curing fish and in promoting effective cooperation between fishermen, dealers, and distributors. Deferred classification requested on account of his special knowledge of methods of preserving fish as food.

Harden F. Taylor, District of Columbia. Length of service: 3 years. Character of work and reason for claim: Highly technical work and experiments which relate to the preservation and preparation of fish as food. Deferred classification requested on account of his experience and expert technical knowledge.

The total of statutory positions in this bureau held by men during the past fiscal year is 370. Among these positions there were, on June 30, 42 vacancies. The number of employees inducted into the military service to June 30 was 31.

No deferred classification was asked for any of the clerical staff of this service.

LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE.

Fifty vessels and a total personnel of 1,132 have been transferred to the Navy. The depots of the service have been utilized for berthing and repairing naval vessels. A large part of the space at Tompkinsville, N. Y., has been turned over to the Navy Department to be utilized as a naval base, and provides headquarters for 20 or more boats, with storehouses, offices, barracks, quarters, etc.

The efficient maintenance of the lighthouses, light vessels, and other aids to navigation is of the utmost importance during war time to the vessels of the Navy as well as to all shipping. Exemptions asked have been only of persons indispensable to this end.

Reason for claims: Deferred classification was requested in the following cases because the employees were stationed on lighthouse vessels or at light stations of the highest importance to be maintained in an efficient manner, and these well-trained and tried men could not be replaced under present conditions without great difficulty, if at all.

Peter D. Ance, Charlevoix, Mich. Length of service: 7 years 7 months. Character of work: Master Grays Reef Light Vessel, Michigan.

Thomas L. Kelly, Key West, Fla. Length of service: 5 years 8 months. Character of work: Assistant keeper Carysfort Reef Light Station, Florida.

Axel Lorentzen, 458 Court Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. Length of service: 1 year 3 months. Character of work: Assistant engineer Five Fathom Bank Light Vessel, New Jersey.

Sverre Carlson, 203 Lafayette Avenue, Staten Island, N. Y. Length of service: 1 year 8 months. Character of work: Fireman Ambrose Channel Light Vessel, New York.

Francis T. Douglass, 121 East Eighty-eighth Street, New York. Length of service: 5 years 7 months. Character of work: Engineer Relief Light Vessel No. 51, Tompkinsville, N. Y.

Roy L. Murphy, Ogdensburg, N. Y. Length of service: 9 months. Character of work: Assistant keeper Cleveland Harbor Lights, Ohio.

Samuel E. Crozier, Youngstown, N. Y. Length of service: 9 months. Character of work: Assistant keeper Cleveland Harbor Lights, Ohio.

Daniel C. Corlett, Cheboygan, Mich. Length of service: 1 year 10 months. Character of work: Engineer Buffalo Light Vessel, New York.

Henrik G. Olsen, Aloha, Mich. Length of service: 9 years 9 months. Character of work: Assistant keeper, White Shoal Light Station, Mich.

Wesley Gray, 247 Cumberland Avenue, Portland, Me. Length of service: 3 years 6 months. Character of work: Assistant keeper, Halfway Rock Light Station, Me.

Peter Rasmussen, 124 Cedar Grove Avenue, New London, Conn. Length of service: 2 years 2 months. Character of work: Engineer, Cornfield Point Light Vessel, Conn.

George C. Birch, Lewes, Del. Length of service: 2 years 2 months. Character of work: Fireman, Overfalls Light Vessel No. 69, Del.

Herman F. Metevier, 200 State Street, Cheboygan, Mich. Length of service: 1 year 3 months. Character of work: Assistant engineer, Martin Reef Light Vessel, Mich.

Edward Kott, Calumet Harbor Light Station, South Chicago, Ill. Length of service: 4 years. Character of work: Assistant keeper, Calumet Harbor Light Station, Ill.

Carl A. Madsen, R. F. D. No. 4, Falmouth, Me. Length of service: 1 year 4 months. Character of work: Mate, Portland Light Vessel, Me.

Frank A. Davis, Duxbury Pier Light, Plymouth Harbor, Mass. Length of service: 1 year 11 months. Character of Work: Keeper, Duxbury Pier Light, Mass.

James K. Haleamau, Kailua, Hawaii, T. H. Length of service: 4 years 10 months. Character of work: Keeper, Kailua Light Station, Hawaii.

George Ah Choy, Kohala, Hawaii, T. H. Length of service: 1 year 3 months. Character of work: Keeper, Kauhola Point Light Station, Hawaii.

Mark McDonough, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 6 months. Character of work: Fireman, lighthouse tender Cedar.

Andre H. Roness, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 7 months. Character of work: Quartermaster, lighthouse tender Cedar.

Nels M. Jensen, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 3 months. Character of work: Seaman, lighthouse tender Cedar.

Charles Nerup, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 4 years 7 months. Character of work: Boatswain, lighthouse tender Cedar.

Harry F. Howard, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 8 months. Character of work: Machinist, lighthouse tender Cedar.

James J. Jefferson, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 3 years 11 months. Character of work: Assistant engineer, lighthouse tender Cedar.

Fred. O. Daggett, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 8 months. Character of work: Machinist, lighthouse tender Cedar.

Thomas Donahey, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 5 months. Character of work: Seaman, lighthouse tender Cedar.

Charles R. Moore, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Second officer lighthouse tender Cedar.

Charles G. Johnson, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Fireman, lighthouse tender Cedar.

George L. Metzger, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 1½ months. Character of work: Seaman, lighthouse tender Cedar.

William H. Barton, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 4 years 8 months. Character of work: First officer lighthouse tender Cedar.

Francis Britt, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 5 months. Character of work: Quartermaster, lighthouse tender Cedar.

Robert Martin, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 7 months. Character of work: Quartermaster, lighthouse tender Cedar.

Ole Ericson, Bartlett Reef Light Vessel, Conn. Length of service: 7 months. Character of work: Seaman, Bartlett Reef light vessel, Conn.

Jack W. Storey, Ketchikan, Alaska. Length of service: 3 months. Character of work: Seaman, lighthouse tender Cedar.

Scotty O. Therrien, Mackinac Island, Mich. Length of service: 1 year 1 month. Character of work: Assistant keeper, Chicago Harbor Light Station, Ill.

John Freeman, 4610 West Willow Street, Seattle, Wash. Length of service: 9 months. Character of work: Seaman, Umatilla Reef Light Vessel No. 67, Wash.

John C. Taylor, Erma, N. J. Length of service: 7 months. Character of work: Seaman, Five-Fathom Bank Light Vessel No. 79, N. J.

Nicholas Eckel, 419 Chestnut Street, Detroit, Mich. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Assistant keeper, Rock of Ages Light Station, Mich.

Thomas J. Eckel, 419 Chestnut Street, Detroit, Mich. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Assistant keeper, Rock of Ages Light Station, Mich.

John H. Sullivan, Cross Village, Mich. Length of service: 3 years. Character of work: Assistant keeper, White Shoal Light Station, Mich.

Thomas F. Smith, 418 Customhouse, St. Louis, Mo. Length of service: 8 years. Character of work: Engineer, lighthouse tender Oleander.

Carlton Roberts, Key West, Fla. Length of service: 5 years 8 months. Character of work: Assistant keeper Alligator Reef Light Station, Fla.

Judson Colbeth, 847 Main Street, Westbrook, Me. Length of service: 3 months. Character of work: Assistant keeper Crabtree Ledge Light Station, Me.

Andrew Larsen, Brenton Reef Light Vessel, R. I. Length of service: 5 years 10 months. Character of work: Machinist, Brenton Reef Light Vessel No. 39, R. I.

Louis Hudak, Cheboygan, Mich. Length of service: 4 years 9 months. Character of work: Assistant keeper Spectacle Reef Light Station, Mich.

Reasons for claims: Deferred classification was requested in the following cases because of the same reasons stated for the preceding group, and also because the men named were stationed on vessels of the Lighthouse Service transferred to the Navy in accordance with law, and hence were actually in the naval service:

James L. Benjamin, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 8 months. Character of work: Fireman, lighthouse tender Manzanita.

Axel, E. J. Anderson, 1577 Harrison Street, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 3 years 3 months. Character of work: Machinist, lighthouse tender Manzanita.

Ole J. Lilleoren, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 5 years 8 months. Character of work: Second officer lighthouse tender Heather.

Henry Carlson, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 2 years 9 months. Character of work: Machinist, lighthouse tender Manzanita.

Nicolas Schurgel, 471 Valley Street, San Francisco, Cal. Length of service: 6 months. Character of work: Assistant engineer lighthouse tender Manzanita.

Emil Raanti, 104 Washington Street, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 2 months. Character of work: Fireman, lighthouse tender Manzanita.

Thorvald Thorkilson, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 1 year 2 months. Character of work: Seaman, lighthouse tender Manzanita.

C. L. Nielsen, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 1 year 6 months. Character of work: Seaman, lighthouse tender Heather.

Ben Larsen, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 7 months. Character of work: Seaman, lighthouse tender Heather.

Ole Nelson, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 1 year 7 months. Character of work: Seaman, lighthouse tender Manzanita.

Sverre Christensen, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Quartermaster lighthouse tender Heather.

Marcus Jacobsen, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 2 years. Character of work: Fireman, lighthouse tender Heather.

Lars Bjelland, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 2 years 5 months. Character of work: Quartermaster lighthouse tender Heather.

Ole Volden, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 1 month. Character of work: Seaman, lighthouse tender Columbine.

Gus Montague, Wanchese, N. C. Length of service: 4 years. Character of work: First officer lighthouse tender John Rodgers.

Hjalmar Herlin, 1381 Franklin Avenue, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 3 months. Character of work: Quartermaster lighthouse tender Manzanita.

Ivar Brevik, 427 Thirtieth Street, Astoria, Oreg. Length of service: 3½ months. Character of work: Seaman, lighthouse tender Manzanita.

Reason for claim: Deferred classification was requested in the following cases because these employees are engaged in repairing and installing illuminating apparatus peculiar to the Lighthouse Service, in which work they are specially skilled and could not be replaced without much delay, which would be seriously detrimental to the upkeep of the aids to navigation, especially essential during the continuance of the war:

Roger P. Leonard, 706 North Montford Avenue, Baltimore, Md. Length of service: 3 years 8 months. Character of work: Foreman machinist, Lazaretto Lighthouse Depot, Md.

Harry W. Howard, 376 Connecticut Street, Buffalo, N. Y. Length of service: 2 years 10 months. Character of work: Assistant mechanician, tenth lighthouse district.

William C. Helbig, Buffalo, N. Y. Length of service: 12 years 5 months. Character of work: Mechanician, tenth lighthouse district.

Sydnor M. Falconer, jr., 5425 Ninth Street NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 3 years 4 months. Character of work and reason for claim: Draftsman, especially experienced in unusual problems presented by lighthouse work. It would be very difficult to obtain draftsmen qualified for such work.

Thomas H. Soyster, 1401 Columbia Road NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 6 months. Character of work and reasons for claim: Marine draftsman, especially experienced in unusual problems presented by lighthouse work. It is now extremely difficult or impossible to obtain draftsmen.

Reasons for claim: Deferred classification was asked for the following because these mechanics were specially trained in the work of the Lighthouse Service and are employed also on work done at the General Lighthouse Depot for the Navy Department, and it is extremely difficult under present conditions to fill their places:

Henry C. Kortbein, 464 Cary Avenue, West New Brighton, N. Y.: Length of service: 7 years. Character of work, boiler maker, general lighthouse depot, Tompkinsville, N. Y.

Frank A. Schneider, 124 Van Duzer Street, Tompkinsville, N. Y.: Length of service: 5 days. Character of work, boiler maker, general lighthouse depot, Tompkinsville, N. Y.

John J. Kendra, Great Kills, N. Y.: Length of service: 11 months. Character of work, blacksmith, general lighthouse depot, Tompkinsville, N. Y.

John J. Osinski, 56 John Street, Port Richmond, N. Y.: Length of service: 6 years 8 months. Character of work, boiler maker, general lighthouse depot, Tompkinsville, N. Y.

Roswell G. Lamb, 208 Richmond Turnpike, Staten Island, N. Y.: Length of service: 1 year 5 months. Character of work and reason for claim, employed on superintendence of construction and repair work and in drafting work, and has had especially valuable experience. It is practically impossible to fill existing vacancies in similar positions under the present conditions.

William F. Lynch, Ivy Road, Wilmington, Del.: Length of service, 4 years 3 months. Reid O'Meara, Hamilton, Md.: Length of service: 1 month. Character of work and reason for claims: Foremen, working party, fifth lighthouse district, in charge of repair and construction parties. Work of urgent military importance in connection with operations of naval and commercial vessels. Very difficult to replace these men.

Ward J. Lawton, 68 Berkley Place, Brooklyn, N. Y.: Length of service: 3 years 10 months. Character of work and reason for claim, chief clerk, third lighthouse district, Tompkinsville, N. Y., in charge of the large office force at the general lighthouse depot, where much work is being done directly and indirectly for the Navy. Specially trained in work of this depot, and unable to replace with competent, experienced, and capable person.

BUREAU OF STANDARDS.

The work of this service is now almost wholly war work in connection with nearly all the branches of both the Army and Navy. For this purpose a force of 470 on April 1, 1917, has expanded to a total of 1,117 to-day. The demands from the military services come at an average rate of over 20 daily. Among the war activities are the development, production, or testing of various materials and instruments for aircraft parts and for military work, researches for materials for substitutes, cooperation in constructing and testing (to the number of 5,000 monthly) of gauges for munition manufactures, inventing and developing devices for locating enemy batteries in the artillery service.

The employees named in the following are either scientific specialists, by training and qualifications peculiarly fitted for the work they do or are technical experts in the mechanical trades and in the lines of work on which they are engaged.

Deferred classification was requested in the cases named, because, first, the men are directly employed upon specific war activities; second, they are specially qualified by training and experience for such activities; third, it would be impossible to replace them (if that were possible at all) without seriously interrupting the progress of urgent war work:

Leon Adler, Champaign, Ill.: Length of service: 9 months. Character of work, research in chemical metallurgy, gases in steel, and the development of methods of limiting manganese in steel.

Max Albert, Pittsburgh, Pa.: Length of service: 11 months. Character of work, experimental cement researches for military departments.

Gilbert V. Anderson, Philadelphia, Pa. Length of service: 2 months. Character of work: Research and testing of military airplane motors.

H. A. Anderson, Brooklyn, N. Y. Length of service: 8 months. Character of work: Investigating the use of bakelite in propeller construction for airplanes and other materials for aircraft construction.

William C. Andrea, Baltimore, Md. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Designing apparatus and instruments for testing military master gauges used in the manufacture of munitions, Liberty motors, and Liberty trucks.

A. F. Beal, Marshall, Mich. Length of service: 9 months. Character of work: Testing of timepieces for the ships of the Emergency Fleet Corporation and for airplanes of the Signal Corps and testing stop watches for the Ordnance Department for the study of gun firing.

H. S. Bean, Stockton, Cal. Length of service: 7 months: Character of work: Engaged in the inspection and testing of master gauges for munitions, standard motor trucks, and Liberty motors.

E. H. Berger, York County, Pa. Length of service: 8 months. Character of work: Laboratory investigation of bituminous materials.

Robert W. Boreman, Middlebourne, W. Va. Length of service: 2 months. Character of work: Experimental investigation of airplane engine performance at high altitudes.

R. D. Bowker, Athol, Mass. Length of service: 5 months. Character of work: Investigation of sole leather for Army shoes.

H. A. Bright, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 5 years. Character of work: Expert engaged in the investigation and testing of cement materials required by the military departments.

W. B. Brown, Prec. 49, Alameda County, Cal. Length of service: 1 year. Character of work: Expert engaged in research on airplane motor radiators.

Roy W. Bruner, Wellsburg, W. Va. Length of service: 5 months. Character of work: Instrumental work on military problems.

S. M. Burka, Baltimore, Md. Length of service: 1 year and 1 month. Character of work: Engaged in study of the weathering of optical glass for military instruments and in the spectroscopic analysis of war materials.

R. A. Castleman, Ellicott City, Md. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Experimental investigation of airplane radiator performance.

W. C. Chapin, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year and 8 months. Character of work: Expert in the inspection of railroad track scales.

W. L. Chency, Chardon, Ohio. Length of service: 8 months. Character of work: Research in connection with the testing of and specifications for the leather to be used in the manufacture of Army shoes.

E. R. Clark, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year. Character of work: Chemical work on textiles used in making military fabrics.

Simon Collier, Salem, Mass. Length of service: 3 months. Character of work: Research and testing of rubber supplies for military purposes.

E. W. Commery, 1912 East Ninety-seventh Street, Cleveland, Ohio. Length of service: 5 months. Character of work: Development and testing of rifle lights and trench flares and of portable lights for the Army.

Arthur L. Conaty, Providence, R. I. Length of service: 2 months. Character of work: Testing of master gauges for munition plants.

W. E. Congdon, Portland, Me. Length of service: 3 months. Character of work: Development of technical standards practice codes for construction and operation of Government plants.

A. D. Conley, Portland, Me. Length of service: 1 year and 11 months. Character of work: Experimental development of new types of wall board to be used by the Army for the construction of cantonments and other structures here and in France.

J. W. Cook, 213 Second Street SE., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 5 years and 8 months. Character of work: Research problems for the military departments involving liquid air.

Rudolph A. Corvey, Newark, N. J. Length of service: 2 months. Character of work: Inspection and testing of electric lamps for military departments.

C. S. Cragoe, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 4 years. Character of work: Research on airplane spark plugs.

S. J. Crooker, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Research on telephone problems of special importance to military telephone service.

B. L. Cushing, Rockland, Mass. Length of service: 6 months. Character of work: Investigating the strength of materials for airplane construction.

H. J. Daignault, Woonsocket, R. I. Length of service: 2 months. Character of work: Testing military fabrics.

L. I. Dana, 1942 Calvert Street, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Standardization of temperature-measuring instruments for use in arsenals and industrial plants engaged on important war work.

H. A. Davis, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 6 years 10 months. Character of work: Problems involving expert knowledge of supplies required in war work.

R. Davis, 1422 Perry Place NW., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 6 years 10 months. Character of work: Applications of photography to military problems.

W. Davis, 900 Eleventh Street SE., Washington, D. C. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Testing Portland cement for military purposes.

L. H. Dawson, Needham, Mass. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Inspection of gauges used in the manufacture of munitions.

J. H. Dellinger, Montgomery County, Md. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Military research on radio communications.

E. E. Dickson, Chicopee, Mass. Length of service: 6 months. Character of work: Testing of military fabrics and research on the design of balloon and airplane fabrics.

A. Domovsky, 1116 Trenton Avenue, New York City. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Testing military supplies.

R. C. Duncan, 5001 Irving Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Development of electrical equipment for military purposes.

J. R. Dwyer, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 7 months. Character of work: Testing Portland cement for the War and Navy Departments.

William J. A. Ebert, Northampton, Pa. Length of service: 8 months. Character of work: Testing of Portland cement for the War and Navy Departments.

Arthur F. Eckle, Chicago, Ill. Length of service: 7 months. Character of work: Computing and design of military optical instruments.

E. A. Eckhardt, Philadelphia, Pa. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Developing military apparatus.

C. R. Edwards, Chester County, Pa. Length of service: 4 years 2 months. Character of work: Inspection of railroad track scales.

Junius D. Edwards, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 4 years 10 months. Character of work: Military aircraft problems.

Samuel W. Epstein, Warren, Pa. Length of service: 1 year. Character of work: Analysis of rubber materials.

A. J. Erichsen, Atlantic City, N. J. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Testing of adhesives for military purposes.

Fred H. Engles, Kingfisher, Okla.: Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Making of apparatus and appliances used in the military researches of the bureau.

C. A. Fairchild, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 3 years and 2 months. Character of work: Engaged in precision measurements of high temperature and heat tests for military departments.

F. Finklestein, Boston, Mass. Length of service: 1 year and 11 months. Character of work: Testing of thermometers to supply the demands of military departments.

M. F. Fischer, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 4 years and 7 months. Character of work: Engaged in testing compasses for the Signal Corps and Shipping Board.

J. C. Fisher, Berkeley County, W. Va. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Military investigation for the Army and Navy.

John Henry Fisher, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 4 months. Character of work: Military research on new cylinder pressures in aeronautic engines of military airplanes.

Russell T. Fisher, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 8 months. Character of work: Design and construction of apparatus for investigating military fabrics.

R. O. Fitch, Washington, D. C.: Length of service: 4 years and 11 months. Character of work: Military problems, including materials used in construction of cantonments and hospital buildings.

P. D. Foote, Pittsburgh, Pa. Length of service: 6 years and 11 months. Character of work: High temperature testing and research work which the bureau is doing for the several military bureaus, arsenals, etc.

E. L. Fonseca, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year and 6 months. Character of work: Technical investigation of spark-plug behavior in military airplane engines and handling spark-plug tests for the Signal Corps.

R. D. France, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 9 months. Character of work: Ingot investigation and manganese investigation, both of fundamental military importance.

Leopold Freedman, New York City. Length of service: 7 months. Character of work: Construction of apparatus required directly for military use.

H. M. Freeman, Monongalia County, W. Va. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Testing and development of radio apparatus required by both the Army and Navy.

J. R. Freeman, jr., Providence, R. I. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Development of light aluminum alloys for aviation.

I. H. Fullmer, Elyria, Ohio. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Inspector of gauges for munitions, Army motor trucks, and Liberty motors.

Barnett D. Gordon, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 5 months. Character of work: Research on the properties of balloon gases.

D. Goren, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 3 years and 8 months. Character of work: Work for the improvement of methods of locating hostile batteries.

W. S. Gorton, Baltimore, Md. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Work on military applications of X-ray apparatus.

Thomas P. Green, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 7 years and 7 months. Character of work: Most important duties in the care, distribution, and keeping records of stocks of chemicals used in the tests made for military departments.

Albert H. Greenwald, Pittsburgh, Pa. Length of service: 5 years and 5 months. Character of work: Inspecting and testing cement which is bought by the Government for use of the War Department.

Morris C. Gregory, Corning, N. Y. Length of service: 1 year. Character of work: Manufacture of optical glass for the use of the Army and Navy.

Marcus A. Grossman, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 9 months. Character of work: Study of coated metallurgical material for aviation.

Kasson S. Gibson, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year and 6 months. Character of work: Engaged in making optical investigation in ultraviolet spectrophotometry.

Louis J. Gurevich, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year and 10 months. Character of work: Investigation of physical metallurgical methods of platinum testing for purity, and the development of platinum substitutes, in response to direct requests from military departments.

A. E. Hanson, Quincy, Mass. Length of service: 1 year and 9 months. Character of work: Testing and inspection of gauges used in the manufacture of munitions, Army trucks, and Liberty motors.

T. R Harrison, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year and 11 months. Character of work: High-temperature experimentation for the Military Establishments.

R. W. Hart, Stamford, Conn. Length of service: 8 months. Character of work: Testing of and specifications for leather used in the manufacture of Army shoes.

J. M. Hartman, Junction City, Kans. Length of service: 6 months. Character of work: Determining the reliability of various extensometers for use in the inspection of shells and shrapnel.

F. W. Hartman, Milwaukee, Wis. Length of service: 7 months. Character of work: Tests on steel used in airplane construction.

A. R. Harvey, Butler County, Ohio. Length of service: 5 months. Character of work: Investigation of radiator design for both Army and Navy.

A. S. Hathaway, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year and 9 months. Character of work: Inspector of construction on the new war emergency laboratory and other emergency buildings.

B. D. Hathcock, Pittsburgh, Pa. Length of service: 1 year and 10 months. Character of work: Tests on rope, cable, porcelain, insulators, steel, cement, and other engineering materials used in military construction.

R. H. Heald, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 4 months. Character of work: Engaged in testing of airplane models and equipment.

A. M. Heinzlemann, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 2 years and 2 months. Character of work: Testing of ink and ink products, especially on secret inks, for the Bureau of Navy Intelligence.

Mayo D. Hersey, City Hall, Cambridge, Mass. Length of service: 7 years and 10 months. Character of work: Testing of airplane instruments for military purposes.

Walter J. Hinkle, Pittsburgh, Pa. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Engaged in the manufacture of optical glass for military purposes and the making of military optical instruments.

B. H. Hirschensohn, Newport, R. I. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Testing of the haemacytometer pipettes used in the Army and Navy hospitals, and in testing glass volumetric apparatus.

Earle D. Hoats, Northampton, Pa. Length of service: 7 years and 11 months. Character of work: Testing Portland cement for military purposes.

O. J. Hodge, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year and 11 months. Character of work: Investigation work of water-current meters in the development of water resources, and engaged in making tests of immediate military urgency.

C. P. Hoffman, Hudson County, N. J. Length of service: 1 year and 5 months. Character of work: Technical manipulator of the large testing machine which is in constant use for military researches on cast-steel motor-truck wheels for the Army trucks, etc.

L. A. Hoffman, Boston, Mass. Length of service: 6 months. Character of work: Research work on the aeronautic instruments.

F. S. Holbrook, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 8 years and 10 months. Character of work: Supervisor of bureau's track-scale testing equipments used in the testing of railroad-track scales.

H. D. Holler, Columbus, Ohio. Length of service: 3 years and 4 months. Character of work: Electroplating of military materials, chemical investigation of dry cells for military uses.

R. K. Honoman, Lancaster, Pa. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Engaged in important airplane investigation for the aviation service of Signal Corps.

H. Insley, Haverstraw, N. Y. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Testing optical glass for military instruments and in petrographic research on silica brick, porcelain, and other ceramic materials required in military work.

A. Isaacs, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 4 years and 7 months. Character of work: Technical problems connected with refrigeration of great importance to the Military Establishments.

I. M. Jacobsohn, Chicago, Ill. Length of service: 1 year and 4 months. Character of work: Analysis of metallic materials used by the military branches of the Government.

W. S. James, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 7 years. Character of work: Expert in charge of military investigations and the design of cooling radiators for use on military airplanes.

L. Jordon, Urbana, Ill. Length of service: 5 months. Character of work: Research on problems of a special military importance.

A. Joseshof, New York, N. Y. Length of service: 6 months. Character of work: Expert inspector of gauges for munitions.

L. V. Judson, Worcester, Mass. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Determinations of precision measurements of standards for testing meter gauges in the manufacture of munitions and standardizing munition gauges.

H. J. Kaiser, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 7 years 7 months. Character of work: Construction of apparatus required in the military researches for the military departments.

J. C. Karcher, Hennessey, Okla. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Confidential scientific investigations for new and improved methods of locating hostile batteries.

W. Kinney, Northampton, Pa. Length of service: 5 months. Character of work: Testing and investigating Portland cement required for military purposes.

Frank A. Kirkpatrick, Pittsburgh, Pa. Length of service: 1 year 8 months. Character of work: Investigations of lime and gypsum of special value in Government construction work.

R. S. Jessup, Baskerville, Va. Length of service: 1 year 9 months. Character of work: Investigations in the heat laboratories of the bureau for military purposes.

J. A. Keehn, 30 Miller Street, Rochester, N. Y. Length of service: 6 months. Character of work: Construction of apparatus especially designated for testing gauges used in the manufacture of munitions of war.

W. J. Keiss, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 7 years 9 months. Character of work: Inspecting Portland cement for military purposes.

R. Kleinoshmidt, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 9 months. Character of work: Investigation of the design and construction of airplane radiators.

Howard B. Knowles, Taunton, Mass. Length of service: 4 years 11 months. Character of work: Military testing for the Ordnance Department to insure the soundness and other qualities in the metals used in the manufacture of munitions and other military supplies.

Clarence E. Lane, Corydon, Iowa Length of service: 2 months. Character of work: Development of methods and apparatus for locating enemy batteries.

O. A. Lansche, Brighton, Ill. Length of service: 1 year and 8 months. Character of work: Installation of equipment for the testing of military airplane engines under high altitude conditions.

L. J. Larson, Champaign, Ill. Length of service: 1 year and 10 months. Character of work: Military researches on airplane woods.

C. S. Laubly, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 3 years and 11 months. Character of work: Important structural materials, research work for the Navy Department.

E. B. Laughlin, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 6 years and 9 months. Character of work: Inspection and testing of master gauges.

P. G. Ledig, Alta Loma, Cal. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Investigations of military aircraft problems.

A. J. Lewis, Rockland, Mass. Length of service: 1 year and 5 months. Character of work: Analysis of varnishes, linseed oil, etc.

H. A. Linendoll, Champaign, Ill. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Investigation and tests of coated metals for military airplane construction.

M. B. Long, Lincoln, Nebr. Length of service: 8 months. Character of work: Standardizing the radiation of quartz mercury vapor lamps for fabrics, also developing a radiometric signaling device for military purposes.

F. D. Lowell, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 5 years and 4 months. Character of work: Calibration of radio instruments required by the Army and Navy radio services.

G. E. Lund, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 9 months. Character of work: Construction of apparatus required for military use.

W. O. Lytle, 1313 Vermont Street, Lawrence, Kans. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Radio investigations and military tests involving radio problems.

Oscar L. Maag, Pittsburgh, Pa. Length of service: 3 months. Character of work: Manufacture of optical glass for military instruments.

G. V. Maconi, New Haven, Conn. Length of service: 1 month. Character of work: Special tests on concrete to find a lightweight concrete of suitable building strength for shipbuilding.

F. W. Martin, Boston, Mass. Length of service: 5 years and 7 months. Character of work: Testing thermometers for the military departments.

J. J. R. Martin, Bridgeport, Conn. Length of service: 5 months. Character of work: Testing master gauges for military purposes.

L. O. Maxwell, Urbana, Ill. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: Working on steels to be used for military purposes.

R. S. McBride, 20 Hesketh Street, Chevy Chase, Md. Length of service: 8 years and 9 months. Character of work: Researches involving gas production, quality and distribution.

F. J. McGrath, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 9 months. Character of work: Experimental study of the heat-retaining properties of military clothing materials.

H. J. McNicholas, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year and 10 months. Character of work: Study of military glasses having selective color absorption, a subject of importance to the military departments.

A. T. McPherson, Austin, Tex. Length of service: 4 months. Character of work: Confidential researches on certain gases used in warfare.

W. F. Meggers, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 4 years. Character of work: Highly technical work having direct military application.

Lewis L. Mellor, Cleveland Heights, Ohio. Length of service: 4 months. Character of work: Testing and investigation of optical military instruments for the use in the war.

P. D. Merica, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 3 years and 10 months. Character of work: Development and investigation of light alloys for aircraft construction.

P. W. Merrill, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 1 year and 11 months. Character of work: Technical problems in optical glass production for military purposes.

G. E. Merritt, New York City, N. Y. Length of service: 11 months. Character of work: In charge of the index measurements of optical glass, a work of great military importance.

C. H. Meyers, Gresham, Oreg. Length of service: 4 years and 1 month. Character of work: Engaged on military investigations involving his expert knowledge and skill in heat measurements.

R. F. Miller, Altoona, Pa. Length of service: 1 year and 6 months. Character of work: Testing haemacytometer for use in Army and Navy hospitals and glass volumetric apparatus used in munitions laboratories.

H. H. Moore, Washington, D. C. Length of service: 3 years 5 months. Character of work: Design and construction of apparatus for naval-gun firing.

I. L. Moore, Worcester, Mass. Length of service: 10 months. Character of work: Investigations of military aircraft problems.

R. Morgan, Cambridge City, Ind. Length of service: 6 months. Character of work: Measurement of inductance coils and condensers for the Army and Navy radio service.

ELECTION TO COMMITTEE.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move the election of the Hon. SCHUYLER OTIS BLAND to membership on the Committee on Insular Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina moves the election of Mr. BLAND of Virginia to the Committee on Insular Affairs. Is there any other nomination? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

The motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. To correct the RECORD.

On page 8869 of the RECORD appears the following:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee, how long he thinks that bill will take?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, my recollection is that the other water-power bills did not take more than two or three days. One of them, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, dealt alone with navigable streams. Another one, from the Committee on the Public Lands, dealt with water power on public lands. This bill deals with all combined water-power legislation, and naturally it will take longer. But I do not think it will take, even with due and fair consideration, more than two or three days. But I can not possibly tell.

Now, there is omitted from the RECORD at this point an important demand which a gentleman on that side of the aisle made and which every person on the floor heard:

Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

Mr. DENISON. That was the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DENISON] heard the demand for the regular order, and says that it was made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON]. I also heard him make it, as did everybody else in the House. Then follows:

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, if this bill is passed and the Unanimous-Consent Calendar is disposed of, would the gentleman be in favor of a recess of Congress?

Mr. SIMS. I will answer that question when the time comes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Did he say that in reply to me, or did he put that in afterwards?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not know. Did the gentleman from Wisconsin say that?

Mr. STAFFORD. I asked that of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], but did not get any reply, because the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] asked for the regular order.

Mr. DENISON. He made the reply.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Then follows:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I object.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin object?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do.

The demand for the regular order prevented any further discussion, and therefore before making objection I said that if I was not to be permitted to ask a question or two I should object. I did object and supposed that the matter of unanimous consent was ended for that day. But I was mistaken, and in view of what was said later in the day by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], when he secured unanimous consent for the taking up of the same bill to-day, I wish to say that the gentleman from Tennessee did come to see me immediately after I had made the objection.

He said that he had first asked unanimous consent to have the bill taken up on Monday next, and that to this the gentleman from Massachusetts had objected, and that therefore at the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts he had asked unanimous consent to take it up to-day. In reply I said: "There is nothing urgent about this. It is very important, but it is not a war measure. The work can not be done during the war. The bill can much better be considered later during this Congress," and so forth. He said that he wanted to bring it up, but did not want to take advantage of me during my absence. I remained here all of the time until about 5 o'clock, when, seeing that the bill then being discussed could not reach a vote before adjournment, I went to my office to attend to some mail. I had only just gone, as the RECORD shows, before the gentleman from Tennessee arose and said that he understood that the gentleman to whom he had spoken had no objection to taking up this important bill at this time.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman want done about this RECORD?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I can not now do anything except to express my profound grief that the gentleman from Tennessee should have misunderstood so perfectly what I said. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. There were a number of requests by Members of the House, after I had the talk with the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], that we should get to work on this water-power bill as early as possible. It is true I did not make the request until about the time the gentleman said I did, but the reason I did not was that the House was in Committee of the Whole, considering another bill, and I could not make my request until the committee rose. I understood that the gentleman from Wisconsin, in talking about the matter, said that he really had not had time to read the bill and understand it. I drew the inference at the time when the regular order was demanded and the gentleman from Wisconsin said that if he could not get opportunity to ask a few questions about it that he would object. That made the impression on my mind that the objection was rather on account of the demand for the regular order than anything else. I did not want to bring up the request again without notifying him and asking if he was serious in his objection to the bill. The gentleman did say in substance all he has stated. I did not want to take any advantage of him. Such was not my intention.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. NELSON as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

DISPOSITION OF NARCOTIC DRUGS.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9830) providing for the disposition of opium, its salts and derivatives, coca leaves, their salts and derivatives, and any other drugs seized by the United States Government in the enforcement of the provisions of the act of October 1, 1890, as amended by the act of March 3, 1897, February 9, 1909, and January 17, 1914, or the act of December 17, 1914.

Mr. GILLETT. I will have to object. We ought to have unanimous-consent day pretty soon.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I will withdraw it if there is any opposition to it.

Mr. GILLETT. It will come up by unanimous consent on Monday. I think the gentleman ought to wait until then.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk Senate joint resolution 164.

Mr. GILLETT. I will make the same objection to that.

PERSONAL STATEMENT.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is a further statement in this connection which I desire to make. This matter of having the Spanish-American War widows' bill considered had been presented to the Committee on Rules, by petition signed by a large number of the Members of the House, and it was my distinct understanding, after talking with gentlemen interested in the bill and with others interested in the water-power bill—and one of these gentlemen was a member of the Committee on Rules itself—that both bills were to be considered by the Committee on Rules; that a rule would be brought in to have both bills considered by the House and making the Spanish-American War widows' bill first in order, because it had in previous Congresses three times passed the House, and would now require but little, if any, time for debate. I went to my office with the distinct understanding that the Committee on Rules was to bring in such a rule for the consideration of the two bills, and that the Spanish-American War widows' bill would have the right of way.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Let us have the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

LEGISLATION RESPECTING THE NAVY.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, there are four bills upon the Union Calendar which have been enacted in legislation in the general appropriation bill, and I want to have them taken from the calendar and move that they lie on the table. They are the bills H. R. 6982, Union Calendar No. 120; H. R. 9390, Union Calendar No. 132; Senate bill 3126, Union Calendar 134; and H. R. 9747, Union Calendar 197. These have been enacted on the appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks that the bills that he cites by number lie on the table, because they have already been enacted into law in another way. The Clerk will announce them.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 6982, No. 120 on the Union Calendar; H. R. 9390, No. 132 on the Union Calendar; S. 3126, No. 134 on the Union Calendar; and H. R. 9747, No. 197 on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, they will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1419; but prior to that I wish to see if we can make an agreement between Mr. ESCH of Wisconsin and myself as to the control of the debate. I submit this as a unanimous-consent request, that the time of general debate be equally divided between the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself, he to control one-half and myself one-half.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 1419, the water-power bill, and pending that he asks unanimous consent that he control one half the time, and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] the other half.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to ask the chairman how it is going to be possible for the membership who want to know something about this subject to get Part I of the hearings, consisting of more than 600 pages? Where can we get copies?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I asked that a copy be mailed to every Member, and I believe it was so mailed. That took more than half of what we had printed, and the others have been given out at the request of Members.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have had no copy of Part I. On several occasions I sent to the committee rooms for copies, and have been unable to get a copy of the first part, 600 printed pages, of the more than 800 pages.

Mr. SIMS. There has been one copy mailed to every Member of the House. I do not know whether they got them or not. I could not follow them up, but there was one mailed to every Member of the House as soon as they were printed. I think we have remaining one copy for each member of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. So that 600 pages of these hearings are not available, and unless a Member has seen them he is entirely dependent on the debate for information?

Mr. SIMS. The other copies of the hearings were given out on the request of Members very largely. Of course, there were some persons who appeared before the committee who received copies, and copies were sent to libraries and one thing and another throughout the country.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I doubt if one-tenth of the membership of this House have seen copies of Part I of the hearings.

Mr. SIMS. I regret it very much, but I can not follow up to see whether Members get their mail.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield? I have tried to get a copy of Part I of the hearings, but have been unable to do so. I have got the other two or three parts, and there seem to be plenty of them. Now, why are there not going to be some more of the first part printed?

Mr. SIMS. I would be very glad indeed if we could have a reprint of the first number, but it takes an order of the House to get it. I shall be glad to have it, if it can be done.

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman has no intention, I assume, of closing the general debate to-day?

Mr. SIMS. I have no thought of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. CANNON. The debate had better run on without any attempt to close it.

The SPEAKER. This is not an attempt to close debate.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to an equal division of the time.

Mr. FERRIS. I understand there will be a disposition to yield to those who oppose certain features of the bill, as well as to those who favor it.

Mr. SIMS. As far as I am concerned, absolutely so.

Mr. FERRIS. And if need be they will be yielded an equal amount of time?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; there is no intention of cutting off anybody.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. SIMS was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, with Mr. WEBB in the chair.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I know this is quite a long bill, but it is also quite an important one, and we are to be asked to substitute the House amendment for the Senate bill. I think at least the House amendment ought to be read, and I will object to dispensing with the first reading.

Mr. SIMS. But the gentleman is willing that the House amendment shall be read, and not the Senate bill?

Mr. WALSH. I only ask that the House amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman modify his request?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; I ask that the House amendment be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the House amendment.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

During the reading,

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, where is the Clerk reading?

The CHAIRMAN. He is just beginning section 18.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask to dispense with the further reading, because nobody can skip from one page to another to keep pace with the reading. I am not complaining of the Clerk at all, but I think maybe discussion would be better——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman from Illinois that the Clerk has read every word of the language up to the present point. The Chair has followed him, and he has not skipped anything.

Mr. SIMS. I should be very glad to dispense with the further reading. I asked to dispense with all of the first reading, but there was objection on that side.

Mr. CANNON. On what page is the Clerk reading?

The CHAIRMAN. Page 45.

Mr. CANNON. If the Chair says the Clerk has read it all, then he has, but he has made most marvelous progress.

Mr. SIMS. The consecutive paging includes the Senate bill, which was stricken out, as well as the House amendment, which he is reading.

Mr. WELLING. The Clerk has read only 22 pages. The first 23 pages are the Senate bill, which he has not read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk has read only 22 pages, which is not an excessive amount to read within the time that he has been reading.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the further first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is recognized.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to obstruct the consideration of this bill. Unless somebody understands it better than I do, after pretty nearly an all night's work reading the bill, not many of us can get outside of it; but as the chairman of the committee is about to address the House, I think there ought to be a quorum to hear him.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of no quorum?

Mr. CANNON. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Fifty-seven Members present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee having under consideration the bill S. 1419, the water-power bill, found itself without a quorum, whereupon he caused the roll to be called, and 228 Members answered to their names, and he presented a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to request the membership of the committee that as long as they are present they do not disturb me by conversation on the floor. I will take no exception whatever to any gentleman leaving the Hall on account of looking after matters which he feels that he ought to look after, but I would like to have the attention of those present while they are here. I have no set speech. All I want to do is to try, as well as I can, to give the House the parliamentary situation, as well as a general outline of the fundamental propositions involved in the bill before us.

The Senate has passed heretofore water-power bills which came to the House, and we have passed substitutes for them which went to conference, but there has never been a complete agreement between the conferees on the part of the House and the conferees on the part of the Senate on any bill of either House. All bills that have been heretofore considered have been either those confined to the navigable rivers of the country or to power sites on the public lands.

A bill was passed in the Senate last December providing for the development of water-power dams on navigable rivers. That is the bill we are now considering, with a House amendment. Heretofore in former Congresses bills have been reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, passed by the House, but have failed of passage in the Senate.

At the beginning of this session of Congress the President requested a conference with the members of the Committee on Agriculture, the members of the Committee on the Public Lands, the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and also the Committee on Rules, for the purpose of having a special committee formed to which all water-power bills should be referred, with a view of having one bill to cover all legislation required for the different projects. He stated to the Members when we appeared that he had requested the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Interior, and the Secretary of Agriculture to draft a bill that would cover all these water-power questions and jurisdictions and to provide that the three Secretaries should constitute a water-power commission, to whom all applications for license as provided for under the proposed act should be made, and clothed with power to execute the law fully.

The Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee has always had jurisdiction of all legislation with reference to dams on navigable streams for navigation purposes, and the Secretary of War had jurisdiction of such dams and passed on the question of whether or not they were needed for navigation purposes. The Secretary of the Interior has primary charge of public lands not embraced in the forest reserves. The Secretary of Agriculture has primary jurisdiction and supervision of lands in the forest reserves. The committee was formed, as you all remember, by a special rule which was introduced and adopted carrying out the President's suggestion. By virtue of the rule all water-power bills of every kind were referred to the special committee. Among others, was the bill S. 1419, passed in December, and the committee thought it would be advisable to take up the Senate bill and amend it, so that when it passes the House and goes back to the Senate it can go to conference at once, and in that way get as early action as possible. According to estimates that have been made by very competent men, there has been developed in the United States water-power developments as follows: In national forests, 755,000 horsepower; in public domain, 173,000 horsepower; through reservoir development, 72,000 horsepower; requiring right of way over public lands, 1,000,000 horsepower; in navigable streams, 1,000,000 horsepower; in nonnavigable streams and involving lands privately owned, 3,000,000, constituting 6,000,000 horsepower in all that has been developed in the United States.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Perhaps, for the better understanding of this bill, it might be wise here to try to arrive at a part of its intent and application by the process of elimination, leaving that which may be thought debatable hereafter to be discussed. For example, take my own State of Vermont, bounded on the east by the Connecticut River, the upper stretches of which are not navigable, the river being navigable only a part of the way from the sea, and bounded on the west by Lake Champlain, technically navigable, and actually navigable, but not a water likely to be appropriated to water-power purposes.

What becomes of the interior waters of a State so situated? None of those interior waters are considered as navigable streams—with one exception or so—but they are feeders running down into the Connecticut on the one side of the mountains and to Lake Champlain on the other. Will this bill give jurisdiction to the Federal Government over those interior waters so that private capital may not under the laws of the State develop water power hereafter as it has in the past?

Mr. SIMS. Not at all; unless projects to be developed are on lands owned by the United States or are developed on navigable streams. It is possible that impounding waters in tributaries of navigable streams may reduce the flow and the depth of water in the navigable part of the stream, and might in this way so interfere with navigation as to require a permit to develop it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But in the opinion of the gentleman, then, those would be isolated cases which would stand upon their own merits with relation to the general purposes of the bill?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But as a public policy it is not the purpose of this bill to take away from the State government the right to direct and oversee or to license the use of those interior waters according to State law now existing or hereafter to be passed?

Mr. SIMS. Not at all; and could not, I think. In other words, if we passed such a law, it would be void as to such projects.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I am under the impression that in what we used to call the "West," and I am quite sure it is true in Illinois and Indiana and perhaps in many other States, scores and scores of acts of Congress have declared spring branches navigable.

Mr. SIMS. They are navigable as a matter of law.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely; and would come under the bill?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. Any navigable stream that is within the jurisdiction of the Secretary of War or the Congress of the United States, with reference to interstate commerce is a navigable stream, as I understand it, within the meaning of this bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, if I may follow just a moment with my questions, the interior waters of my State, as I have said, run on either side to waters that are, of course, technically navigable; but in no case—with the exception noted—do the waters bordering that State on either side in their capacity as navigable waters have any relation to navigation such as is contemplated by the bill. The Connecticut River is as we say navigable only part way from the sea, and therefrom up to the Canadian line it is simply a great stream.

Lake Champlain, of course, is a body of water that does not of itself develop any water power. What becomes of these feeders if they are to be by some association of ideas thrown in as a part of this navigable system? Will the policy of the bill prevent people utilizing that power except through the Federal authorities because those interior streams are in some sense a part of the network of navigable streams or waters?

Mr. SIMS. Not at all, unless the building of the structures should so reduce the flow of the water as to impair navigation in the navigable part of the river into which they flow.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. In these cases these little streams must of necessity flow over the dam on their own way again to the waters which continue to the navigable waters.

Mr. SIMS. And therefore would not affect the navigable part. I do not think the gentleman need to have any apprehension as to any disturbance on such streams as that. Such is not contemplated.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yet they still go to make up navigable waters.

Mr. SIMS. If you impair or destroy navigation, or the navigable part of the river, why then that impediment could be removed by the Secretary of War.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Exactly, and that is the point I want to get at. Who is to determine whether the first intention to use those waters at all must first be submitted to the Federal Government?

Mr. SIMS. I do not see any need of submitting to the Federal Government under this law or any other law in order to have a dam constructed on a stream which is entirely and wholly within a State——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Well, there is always the possibility that somebody may afterwards raise the question whether this interferes with navigation, whereas the work contemplated in the first intention is under State law and by State authority and supposedly exclusively under State jurisdiction.

Mr. SIMS. Unless the fact has been ascertained or demonstrated that there was an impeding of the water, an impounding of the water, a diverting of it, to such an extent as to impair the navigable portion of the river——

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does not that mean eventually under the policy of this law you have to first make sure you do not do anything to obstruct the navigability and submit to a Federal authority as to whether you can at all or not?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think the provisions of this bill are as broad as that. Such is not contemplated.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. SINNOTT. I understand all the navigable waters come within the provisions of this act. That is true.

Mr. SIMS. That is my understanding.

Mr. SINNOTT. Section 3, on the top of page 26, defines "navigable waters" as "all streams or parts of streams and other bodies of water or parts thereof, over which Congress has jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States." Now, is it not generally conceded that Congress has jurisdiction over nonnavigable feeders flowing into navigable streams?

Mr. SIMS. Not unless it interferes so as to impair the navigability of the stream into which it flows.

Mr. SINNOTT. Then Congress has jurisdiction over that nonnavigable part for the purpose of protecting the navigable part and the flow of water?

Mr. SIMS. Only to the extent it may impair navigation.

Mr. SINNOTT. Therefore Congress having jurisdiction over that small feeder, that small feeder under the provisions of this act is what is termed "navigable water," and therefore that small feeder would come under the provisions of this act?

Mr. SIMS. Providing it would have the effect of impeding the navigation of the principal stream into which it flows, which is a question of fact to be determined as such.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is not the provision of the act and that definition is one feature of the act I object to, thereby surrendering the jurisdiction to the Government over these small feeders.

Mr. SIMS. The Supreme Court of the United States has passed on that question.

Mr. SINNOTT. Unless it is necessary to conserve the water in the feeder for the navigation in the larger stream I object to requiring anyone who desires to develop power on privately owned land, on these little nonnavigable feeders, to apply to a Federal commission.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think there is any provision in the law that contemplates any such regulation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Does it not follow as a matter of logical sequence that if the Federal Government has power to stop something which has been done because it injures a Federal right, then it has the right to prevent it being done at all?

Mr. SIMS. Providing that fact is alleged, charged, and proven.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Precisely, and that means in order to be sure you will not have anything stopped you must first go and find out whether it can be begun or not?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, is not that the condition irrespective of whether this act is passed or not?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. It may be; but this bill is to make more specific definition of what are Federal rights.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, the bill in its definition can not enlarge the scope of Federal jurisdiction over navigable streams.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But the bill by implication merely——

Mr. SHERLEY. It does not matter what you write into it the fact remains Congress can not by simply saying it has jurisdiction get jurisdiction.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I want to make certain there shall not be a hold-up of the right the man received under State law until he finds out whether he has any such right under the Federal Government.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is he not in a better situation where he can go to a definite forum and have a determination of the fact instead of simply now acting without real knowledge as to whether or not he is violating the Federal law?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Would the gentleman be willing to make that same application to all the other commercial and business relations of men so that we would better consult a Federal statute or the Federal Government before we do anything under State laws.

Mr. SHERLEY. No; but I say that when a man undertakes to do something that may be against Federal law the burden is on him to see that it is not.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Exactly so; but up to this time nobody has ever held that mountain streams or other small streams in the interior of a State had any relation to a Federal stream as to navigation.

Mr. SHERLEY. In the first place, I would not accept the statement as absolutely accurate; but to the extent it is accurate I do not think this bill sustains it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Has the gentleman some specific declaration in this bill in mind in support of it?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think it follows that because a stream in a State is not navigable in a physical sense it is exclusively in the jurisdiction of the State, and I do not think any good lawyer has so contended.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not contend that.

Mr. SHERLEY. On the other hand, I do not think this bill undertakes to make a stream, where the facts do not warrant it, within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman submit to a question?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There is no specific disclaimer in the bill protecting the very thing the gentleman refers to.

Mr. SHERLEY. You do not have to have a disclaimer. A legislative body does not have to disclaim taking jurisdiction of a thing it can not take jurisdiction of.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Here is the point that is apparent to any of us, whether friends of the bill or opponents of it: Every one of the interior waters interlocks with another, and eventually finds its way down to navigability.

Mr. SHERLEY. The determination of that would have to depend in each instance on the actual physical condition in connection with the stream.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This water all runs down hill.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course it does. We do not make it all within the jurisdiction of the Federal Government.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Now then, I want to know how precisely the limitations are fixed, so that a man who wants to do business knows when he is safe?

Mr. SHERLEY. The only way he will know that he is safe is by a knowledge of the physical conditions and not by any enactment here.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That would be ordinary common sense if they were not supervised by some one under the terms of this law, but who will interpret this law and say where the State jurisdiction begins and where it leaves off, with the water all the time running down hill?

Mr. SHERLEY. I do not think it is possible to make the definition so as to determine the physical fact, and that is the thing that will affect the jurisdiction.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This looks to me a good deal like another reaching out of the Federal hand beyond State lines.

Mr. CANNON. Would the gentleman allow me? I am in perfect good faith in asking the question. When flat boats went to New Orleans, it being the only way we got to market before the day of railroads, the Wabash, including all of it, was declared to be a navigable stream. The Vermillion River, which runs past my town, floated flat boats down from Danville. On the Sugar River and the Eel River, and a great many tributaries, flat boats were constructed, and they floated down at high water. Now, on the statute books there are scores and scores of these little streams that are nonnavigable, in fact, that are declared to be navigable. Does the gentleman propose to repeal the laws that made them navigable?

Mr. SIMS. The bill provides in plain language what is meant by navigable waters, but to me it is almost no definition, and it is for the reason given by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. Navigation is a question of fact, or the impairing of navigation is a question of fact, and that has to be gone into when the question arises. We could not set out in the law details as to when a certain state of facts would amount to impeding or impairing navigation.

Mr. CANNON. I suppose in the end the question of fact would lead to masses of litigation.

Mr. SHERLEY. Has not the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] stated that situation rather conversely? Has not this frequently happened, that Congress has declared a technically navigable stream nonnavigable rather than declared navigable streams that are in fact not navigable?

Mr. CANNON. They did not so declare. I do not know of any special act that declares any stream nonnavigable.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think there have been any number of them in connection with the granting of permits to build bridges, and so forth.

Mr. CANNON. Permission to build bridges?

Mr. SHERLEY. The declaration that a stream was nonnavigable so as to take it out of the restrictions touching navigable streams.

Mr. CANNON. You probably best do it by wholesale, then, if this bill is to become a law.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a statement to the committee at this point. I agreed before going into the Committee of the Whole, and before beginning my speech, that if the Committee on Rules made report of a certain rule I would ask the committee to rise and let that rule be considered. The Committee on Rules is now ready with the rule, and I am therefore going to ask the committee to rise for the purpose of carrying out my promise that the rule may be considered. Inasmuch as I have hardly begun my speech, it seems it would be as good a time now as any.

Mr. CANNON. Is this a report from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Does it pertain to this bill?

Mr. SIMS. Not at all. But I agreed to rise. I move that the committee do now rise, Mr. Chairman.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold that a moment?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

ELECTION OF A COMMITTEE MEMBER.

Mr. KITCHIN. Some time ago—and it seems that the Clerk did not get it—I nominated and the House elected Hon. FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA, of Porto Rico, a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs. It seems there is no record of it. Anyhow I renominate him.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina renominates Hon. FELIX CORDOVA DAVILA, of Porto Rico, as a member of the Committee on Insular Affairs. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on confirming the nomination already made.

The nomination was confirmed.

PENSIONS TO DEPENDENTS OF SPANISH WAR VETERANS.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report (No. 752) from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois presents a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 415.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the House shall resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 4444, entitled "An act to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China"; that there shall be not to exceed one hour of general debate, to be divided between those supporting and those opposing the bill. At the conclusion of such general debate the bill shall be considered for amendments under the five-minute rule. After the act shall have been perfected in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union the same shall be reported to the House with such recommendation as the committee may make, whereupon the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the act and all amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONDON. Is it in order for the Committee on Rules to interrupt the consideration of a bill by bringing in a rule, and thus to interrupt the consideration of a bill?

Mr. SIMS. I moved that the committee rise.

The SPEAKER. The House interrupted. The committee had risen. The question is on agreeing to the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] has 20.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the resolution provides for the consideration of the bill S. 4444, which is known as the bill to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, or in China in the Boxer war.

This bill provides for the pensioning of these widows who were married before the passage of this act at $12 a month, provided they have not an income to exceed $250 a year, and for the payment of $2 per month for any minor child under 16 years of age. Where a child is idiotic or helpless the bill provides that the pension may continue after 16 years of age.

The resolution gives one nour of general debate on the bill and then provides that the bill shall be considered under the five-minute rule in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. This bill is similar to the one that passed the House before?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. It passed the House two or three times, and in each case it failed to pass the Senate. In this case it has passed the Senate, and it is proposed to take up the Senate bill.

Mr. GOOD. In what respect does this bill differ from the provision of the law first enacted by Congress granting pensions to widows of soldiers of the Civil War?

Mr. FOSTER. This is very similar to the bill that passed Congress giving $8 a month to widows of soldiers of the Civil War, in which it was provided that the income should not exceed $250 a year and where they were compelled to earn their living by daily work.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. DUPRÉ. In the gentleman's experience will he say whether the Pension Bureau is inclined to be very severe in passing upon the question of income and things of that sort?

Mr. FOSTER. I think the Pension Commissioner has always required proof to show that the income was not $250 a year. How severe he was I could not tell. But I think from what experience I have had in the Pension Office that he has always required that the evidence be produced. Of course it might happen that to-day the widow has an income of $250, and a year from now she might not have that, and she would then be entitled to a pension.

Mr. DUPRÉ. My reason for asking the question is that I do not think that an income of that sort should be taken into consideration by the Government. It is so small that it is almost negligible in these days.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course the pension is only $12 a month.

Mr. LEA of California. Is that income personal to the widow?

Mr. FOSTER. I think it is an income derived from her daily labor.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT] in the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 4444, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4444) to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill. Is there a request for dispensing with the first reading of the bill?

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-nine gentlemen, not a quorum, are present. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and Mr. BANKHEAD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (S. 4444) to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China, found itself without a quorum; whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 232 Members, a quorum, answered to their names, and he presented the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum is present. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, this measure has passed this House on three occasions. On December 4, 1912, in the Sixty-second Congress, the bill was passed with only 25 dissenting votes.

On April 1, 1914, in the Sixty-third Congress, the bill was passed with only 75 dissenting votes.

On February 16, 1916, it passed in the Sixty-fourth Congress without a roll call, and during the general debate only two Members spoke against the measure.

There is only one amendment. On page 1, lines 9 and 10, the words "including all furloughs" have been stricken from the bill. With that exception the measure is the same as the bills put through in other Congresses.

This bill passed the Senate on June 3 and was referred to the Committee on Pensions of the House. The committee made a unanimous report in its favor.

Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the House Committee on Pensions, the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Mr. KEY, is unavoidably absent this afternoon because of illness. During three Congresses this bill has borne his name and on each occasion he has assumed responsibility for guiding it through the House. He has asked me to take his place this afternoon, and it affords me genuine pleasure to comply, because, like Mr. KEY, I have, during the six years I have served in Congress, earnestly advocated the enactment of this legislation. With the permission of the House I will insert in the RECORD at this point an argument in support of the bill prepared by Mr. KEY:

This bill is identical in its provision with H. R. 54, which was considered and passed by the House of Representatives in the Sixty-fourth Congress, and a like bill was passed in the Sixty-third Congress by the House. Neither of these former bills ever reached final consideration in the Senate, though both were approved by the Senate Committee on Pensions and placed upon the calendar.

I would like to invite the attention of the House to some very striking comparative figures presented by the first 12 months of the great world war now going on and the War with Spain, with which this bill has to do. In the present war, from April, 1917, to June, 1918, about 800,000 American soldiers and sailors and marines have been engaged mostly upon the western front in France. In that time, I am informed from reliable sources of information, that the casualties from wounds and diseases were 8,634. In the Spanish War for a similar period the casualties from wounds and diseases were 12,000. I speak of deaths in both instances. In the War with Spain there were about 335,000 Volunteers and 100,000 Regulars, 435,000 in all. It will be noted with about double the number of men in the present conflict for the first year there was almost one-third less deaths than in the first 12 months during the War with Spain. I only mention these facts to give some idea to those who entertain different views that the War with Spain was not entirely a frolic.

I am informed that from 20 to 25 per cent of the veterans of the War with Spain have reentered the United States military or naval service and are now serving in the great world war. In event they should suffer from wounds, injuries, or diseases leading to their death their dependent relatives would not come within the purview of the pending bill as they would undoubtedly take advantage of the far more liberal provisions of the war-risk insurance act.

From the best information and data the Committee on Pensions of the House of Representatives was able to secure when this and the similar bills I have mentioned were before it for consideration, there would not be more than about 4,000 needy widows who would seek pensions and obtain same in the first year or two after the bill becomes a law; and in view of the fact that only about 400,000 veterans of the Army and Navy of the United States whose widows or minor children could possibly have title, it is not believed that there would ever be any large number of applicants for pension or that the bill if enacted into a law would ever call for any very large expenditure of money.

No Member of this body is more earnestly opposed than I am to saddling upon the taxpayers of this country unmerited and unwise pensions, and I will always oppose efforts leading to granting by special or general legislation pensions to those in my opinion not entitled thereto; but I believe in this case that the needy widows and minor children of our brave Spanish War veterans are entitled to the pensions which this bill seeks to provide, and I believe a majority of this House concurs with me in this view and will pass the bill just as they passed the same bill in the Sixty-second, Sixty-third, and Sixty-fourth Congresses. I urge that this be done not only because it is just and proper in my opinion, but also because for too long these pensions have been denied. I think the provisions of this bill should have been enacted into law six years ago.

The bill provides for only widows of soldiers and sailors who actually served 90 days during the War with Spain, received an honorable discharge, and the widow is now not in receipt of a net income in excess of $250 per annum. Exactly the same language is used in this bill as in the law of June 27, 1890, as amended May 9, 1900, relative to dependent widows of Civil War soldiers and sailors.

It provides for minor children until they are 16 years of age.

This bill does not provide pension for the widow or the minor children of a soldier or a sailor of the Regular Establishment unless he actually left the confines of the United States and participated actively in the War with Spain.

Of course it is impossible, as shown by the report accompanying this bill, which is identical with the report on that point filed in the Sixty-third and Sixty-fourth Congresses with the bill just like this introduced by me, to state the exact cost of this bill in event it becomes a law. However, from the best available information which could be obtained by diligent effort of the Committee on Pensions during the Sixty-third, Sixty-fourth, and Sixty-fifth Congresses it is not believed that the first few years' annual cost of this law would be in excess of a million dollars, with a gradual increase annually until a maximum of perhaps two and a half to three million would be reached.

Of course, this is but a small fraction of the amount of money which will be annually turned into the Treasury by the Pension Bureau on account of the death of aged pensioners from the Mexican, Indian, and Civil Wars.

Mr. Chairman, on account of the pressure of other business we are anxious to get this measure through as speedily as possible, and I will reserve the balance of my time, and ask that the bill be read under the five-minute rule, or that the gentleman on the other side use some of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. Does anyone desire to be recognized in opposition to the bill?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a brief digest of pension legislation, including this measure.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a brief digest of pension legislation, including this measure. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROBBINS. I want to ask the gentleman from Colorado a question, if he will yield.

Mr. KEATING. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am very much interested in this bill, and I should like to know why the rate of pension for Spanish-American War widows has been fixed at $12, when we recently fixed the pensions of widows at $25?

Mr. KEATING. This is the form in which the bill passed the Senate. It was the amount fixed in the bills which passed other Congresses, and the Association of Spanish-American War Veterans and others interested felt that it was best not to attempt to raise the rate at this time.

Mr. ROBBINS. I am a Spanish War veteran myself, and I am very much interested in this bill, but I should like to see the amount fixed at $25.

Mr. KEATING. I sympathize with the gentleman's suggestion. There is just as much reason why the widow of a Spanish-American War veteran should have $25 as the widow of any other veteran, but I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that an effort has been made for a number of years to secure this legislation. As I said before, it has passed this House three or four times. At last it has gone through the Senate. We have an opportunity to-day to put the bill through in its present form. I hope the House will pass it in that form, so that it may become a law at once. The question of raising the amount can be considered hereafter.

Mr. ROBBINS. I shall favor its passage in this form rather than imperil its passage by amending it.

Mr. CANNON. I certainly approve of the bill and shall vote for it. The gentleman from Colorado says there is just as much reason for giving $25 a month to the widow of a Spanish War veteran as there is to give that amount to the widow of a Civil War veteran. The gentleman must recollect that it was a long time before Civil War widows got $8 a month.

Mr. KEATING. Yes; I appreciate that, and then there is the difference in age to be considered. The gentleman is quite right.

Mr. CANNON. There is the question of age, and all that kind of thing. Widows of Civil War veterans are in the main too old to marry again, and some of them are helpless. This is the most generous service pension bill for widows of soldiers of the Republic that has ever passed, everything considered, and I quite approve it, because it is only within the last few years that a service pension was granted to widows of the Civil War up to $12, and I believe it is only during this Congress that it has been increased to $25.

Mr. KEATING. The thought I had in mind was that while the Spanish-American widow is younger than the Civil War widow, she is very likely to have dependent children, and not much can be done in these days of the high cost of living with $12 a month for the widow and $2 a month for each dependent child.

Mr. DENISON. Are not the widows of Spanish-American War soldiers who lost their lives in the service entitled to the benefits of the pension law passed some time back by this Congress?

Mr. KEATING. If she can show that the soldier died of disability incurred in the service, a Spanish-American War widow can secure $25 under existing law, but the bill under consideration is a service pension. I will say to the gentleman that it has been extremely difficult in some cases to secure proof that the death of the soldier was due to disability incurred in the service. The Pension Bureau is not disposed to lay proper emphasis upon the effects of malarial fever. Personally I think those soldiers who served in the Tropics and contracted malaria there have seldom recovered from the effects of the disease, and that frequently complications have ensued, and some of the deaths attributed to tuberculosis and other diseases are really traceable to the malaria contracted in the Tropics.

Mr. DENISON. There is no distinction between the widows of soldiers of the Civil War who lost their lives in the service and those who have died from other causes, so far as the amount is concerned.

Mr. KEATING. So far as the widows of Civil War veterans are concerned, they all get $25 a month, without regard to the cause of death.

Mr. DENISON. Does the gentleman think there ought to be a distinction made in that respect between the widows of the Spanish-American War veterans and those of the Civil War?

Mr. KEATING. As I suggested a few minutes ago, considering the high cost of living and all the attendant circumstances, it would be extremely desirable to place all the Spanish-American War widows on the same plane. We are face to face, or at least think we are, with a legislative fact, and we feel that there is an opportunity now to secure for those widows a pension of $12 a month. Under all the circumstances your committee feels that it is best to pass the legislation at that rate and leave the question of increase to future Congresses.

Mr. DENISON. If the bill passes as it is reported, the status of the war widows will be about this: That the widow of the Civil War veteran who lost his life in the service and the widows of those who died since of other causes are each entitled to $25. The widow of the Spanish-American War veteran who lost his life in the service will be entitled to $25, but the widow of a veteran who died from other causes will only be entitled to $12 a month.

Mr. KEATING. And the widows of the soldiers of the Regular Establishment will be entitled to $12 a month.

Mr. DENISON. I am certainly in favor of the bill, but I do not understand why the difference.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's statement, but has attention been called to this: This bill proposes a pension to the widows of Spanish War veterans several years earlier than was done in the case of widows of the Civil War, where the soldier's death is not shown to have been of service origin. In other words, it is now only 20 years since the War with Spain, while the widows of veterans of the Civil War were not granted a pension without proof that the soldier's death was due to service, until over 25 years following the close of the Civil War, and then the latter only got $8 at the start. In these respects this bill is more liberal than was the old laws relating to Civil War widows.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman is quite right, and that matter was called to the attention of the committee by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentelman yield?

Mr. KEATING. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. My attention has been called to two or three cases where the soldier has become helpless since his service, but unable to demonstrate to the Pension Office that it was due to disease or injury contracted in the line of service. He can not draw a pension, and the Pension Committee takes the same view—that unless he can trace his condition to disease or injury contracted in the service he is not pensionable, even by special act. How does it happen that a man who actually served in the war, who is helpless, who, by reason of malaria or some other disease, is unable to prove that it was contracted in the service, is not entitled to a pension, but as soon as he dies his widow will be entitled to a pension? Does not the gentleman think that some legislation ought to be passed liberalizing these strict requirements in the Pension Office?

Mr. KEATING. Perhaps the best answer is that the Spanish War veterans themselves, the men who actually did the fighting, have, in so far as they have expressed themselves officially, asked that the widows might be recognized first. I think that is a fact that should be recorded in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that these veterans of the Spanish-American War ask for legislation for the widows of their comrades before they ask for legislation for themselves. [Applause.] And so to-day the Spanish-American War Veteran Association is urging that we care for this legislation first.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think that is proper and the correct attitude for these men to assume; and yet it seems to me that some correction ought to be made where a man is himself helpless, has a family, wife, and children to support, but is unable to do anything himself for them, having been a Spanish-American War veteran and can not draw a pension because he is unable to prove that his present condition is traceable to the service. I am not averse to the widows getting a pension when entitled to it, but justice requires that the soldier himself ought to be pensioned, too, so that he might enjoy some of its benefits while alive.

Mr. KEATING. As I stated, in response to a question a few moments ago, I think the Pension Office should revise its rulings concerning the results of malarial fever, and in that way some of the cases referred to by the gentleman would be cared for.

Mr. VAN DYKE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. VAN DYKE. I want to just make a statement that the veterans of the Spanish-American War throughout the country at the present time ask that we take care of their comrades' widows, and it is to relieve that situation that we are trying to get this legislation through to-day.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New York. On page 2 there is a provision to pay $2 a month to orphans. I have in mind two cases where the soldier died from disease that was contracted in the Philippines, but it was not traceable to service disability. His wife is also dead, leaving children under the age of 16. How do you interpret this clause in the bill? Would the children get the pension of $12 that the mother would have been entitled to had she lived, or will they only get $2 a month? It seems to me that $2 a month for a minor is a small pension. I am not going to try to amend the bill, because $2 is better than nothing. Do they get $12 a month and the $2 in addition?

Mr. KEATING. They will receive the mother's pension.

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; the gentleman is quite correct. That has always been the policy of the pension law in such cases.

Mr. LITTLE rose.

Mr. KEATING. I will yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I want to confirm what the gentleman from Colorado just stated in regard to the attitude of the Spanish-American War veterans in preferring this legislation for the widows of their comrades before they ask it for themselves. Since I have been here I have never received a request from a Spanish War Veterans' Association of my State asking me for general legislation for the veterans, but they have continually come to me with requests that I support this bill and see that it went through. Ten or twelve years ago, when I was the department commander of the Spanish-American War veterans in the State of Kansas, we took the position then, and it was unanimous, that before we asked anything for the boys themselves we would try and get the widows on the pention roll, so that when the boys passed on the women and the children would be provided for. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] has stated exactly the attitude of the Spanish-American War veterans. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY] has repeatedly suggested that the veterans themselves who were disabled and crippled ought to be pensioned, and I doubt not at the proper time that matter will be presented and attended to, but in the meantime the veterans want the widows provided for first.

Mr. LANGLEY. I thank the gentleman for calling attention to my efforts in behalf of the Spanish War veterans. I agree with him, however, and with the Spanish War Veterans' Association, that the widows should be cared for first, and you can not make this bill too liberal for me. I am heartily for it, and I wish it gave them all $25 a month. I was merely seeking to call attention to some pertinent facts that happened to be within my knowledge, and I thought it an opportune time to say a word for the Spanish War veterans themselves, and that is why I have been making these interruptions.

Mr. LITTLE. I hope that the House will now take the golden opportunity to put into the statute book a provision for these ladies. You must remember that it is 20 years now since that war began, and those who were young women then have begun to go down hill, and if you are ever going to help them, for God's sake do it now.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does not the gentleman think, as suggested by my colleague from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], that cases like those to which he referred should be provided for, especially in view of the added difficulty, as compared with Civil War veterans, that these Spanish War veterans have labored under in getting up proof of service origin of disability? In fact, does he not think that it is about time they should all be pensioned who are disabled, without regard to proof of the connection between their present disability and their service?

Mr. LITTLE. I do.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think so, too. It is not quite as long after the War with Spain as it was after the Civil War before a service-pension law was passed for the Civil War veterans, but, under present conditions, I do not think we should delay any longer.

Mr. LITTLE. It is too long in both cases.

Mr. LANGLEY. I have had such a bill pending for a long time, and I hope it will pass in the near future.

Mr. LITTLE. Well, I am for it.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Colorado yield again?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. While we are discussing this question I would like to get a little information about other widows. What is the status of the widow of a soldier who fought down on the Mexican border about a couple of years ago? I want to know whether that is considered war or not, and what is the status of the widow of a soldier who fought down there on the border?

Mr. KEATING. My impression is that her pension would be $12 a month. She would come under the regular service.

Mr. DENISON. I asked the question for this reason: The widow of a lieutenant who went down there with the forces from my own district, Lieut. Bryden, applied for a pension after her husband died. He came back home after his service was over and the troops were taken to Chicago, which was a much colder climate than the Mexican border. He there contracted a cold, from which he afterwards died. She has been unable to prove that his death was the result of his service, and the Pension Office has denied her a pension recently.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. How long was her husband in the service?

Mr. DENISON. All of the time that they were down on the border.

Mr. McCLINTIC. It was more than 90 days?

Mr. DENISON. Oh, yes; a year, I think.

Mr. KEATING. The gentleman has run afoul of the Pension Office in this case, as a number of Spanish-American War veterans and their widows have in the cases to which I referred a short time ago, in connection with the results of malarial fever. I suggest to the gentleman that he introduce a special bill for the widow of his constituent.

Mr. DENISON. I intend to do that, of course; but I was under the impression that they already had a pensionable status.

Mr. KEATING. They have a pensionable status; but the difficulty in this case is that the widow has not presented sufficient evidence to satisfy the Pension Office.

Mr. LANGLEY. It is purely a question of proof under the existing law. If the evidence is not sufficient to satisfy the Pension Bureau, they will deny her a pension.

Mr. KEATING. But the gentleman might succeed in convincing the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DENISON. The point I make is that the widows of those soldiers still are not entitled to a pension unless they can make the proof that their husbands died from causes resulting from their military service.

Mr. KEATING. They are not entitled to a service pension. The bill now under consideration is a service pension.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Did the officer die before he was discharged?

Mr. DENISON. No; he died immediately after he was discharged.

Mr. LANGLEY. It is all a question of proof.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, to revert to the same question I asked before, if the mother is dead, then she, of course, can not apply for the widow's pension; but will the children, then, under this act, still be entitled to receive the $12 a month as well as the $2?

Mr. KEATING. The same law applies.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Then they will be entitled to the $12 and the $2 additional if the mother was dead before this bill becomes a law.

Mr. KEATING. And they were under 16 years of age.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Under 16 years of age, of course.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Do I understand from the gentleman that, irrespective of the merits of the bill, it is his opinion that it is this bill now or nothing?

Mr. KEATING. That is my judgment.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Under the present conditions.

Mr. KEATING. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman reserves the balance of his time, and if nobody desires to be heard in that position the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act if any volunteer officer or enlisted man who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection, between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, service to be computed from date of enlistment to date of discharge, or any officer or enlisted man of the Regular Establishment who rendered 90 days or more actual military or naval service in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the War with Spain or the Philippine insurrection between April 21, 1898, and July 4, 1902, inclusive, or as a participant in the Chinese Boxer rebellion campaign between June 16, 1900, and October 1, 1900, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, has died or shall hereafter die leaving a widow without means of support other than her daily labor, and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year, or leaving a minor child or children under the age of 16 years, such widow shall upon due proof of her husband's death, without proving his death to be the result of his Army or Navy service, be placed on the pension roll from the date of the filing of her application therefor under this act, at the rate of $12 per month during her widowhood, and shall also be paid $2 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under 16 years of age, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow, leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise permanently helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of said child, or during the period of such disability, and shall commence from the date of application therefor after the passage of this act: Provided further, That said widow shall have married said officer or enlisted man previous to the passage of this act: Provided, however, That this act shall not be so construed as to reduce any pension under any act, public or private.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "and" insert the words "in addition."

Mr. WELTY. So that the bill will read—without means of support other than her daily labor, and, in addition, an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. WELTY. The language, without the words "in addition," should be clear enough to mean that if the widow's net income is $250 in addition to her earnings, without this proposed amendment; but I find that the Pension Department as well as the courts are inclined to construe the law against the beneficiary and in favor of the Government, and I think that the language can not be too clearly expressed, so that there can be no doubt of the intent of Congress.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELTY. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think the language of the bill is perfectly clear as it is framed now. The Pension Bureau so construed that. It is similar to the language of the previous acts. It does not mean the income from her labor, but a net income independent of whatever she may earn herself.

Mr. WELTY. I know, but several Members of the House came to the conclusion that the Pension Department would construe the language otherwise. That is why I offered the amendment.

Mr. LANGLEY. I think the amendment is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WELTY. I will.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have sent to the Clerk's desk an amendment to strike out all of line 8 and all of line 9 to and including the word "year," so as to permit widows to receive a pension without regard to the daily labor or income of $250. Would not the gentleman from Ohio now consent to have my amendment voted on, and if adopted, as I think it should be, it would clear up the entire situation; and if it be not carried, then the gentleman can offer his amendment, which will improve it in some respects.

Mr. WELTY. Well, a pension is for the support of those who really deserve it and need it, for the widows especially who have children and who do not get anything at all; and I do not think we should open the doors wide and give everyone a pension.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I have simply tried to place the widows of the Spanish War soldiers somewhat near the footing the widows of the soldiers of the Civil War sustain. It seems to me they ought not to pay a pension dependent on an income, and besides those who have had experience with pension matters know that more than any other provision causes trouble. There is more difficulty in making investigations to learn a widow's income, the value of her property, the renting of it, and all that than all the rest of the things put together. It seems to me unwise, improper, and it is unjust——

Mr. WELTY. This refers to net income.

Mr. LITTLE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. LITTLE. Is it not a fact that the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan will also obviate any feeling on their part that this is any charity——

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is true.

Mr. LITTLE. Which is very embarrassing.

Mr. WELTY. That may be true, but some of the widows of the Spanish-American War have now been shifting for themselves for almost 20 years and many have not been able to show that the death of their husband could be directly traced to an injury received while in the service, and yet death no doubt often was the result of a weakened condition caused by the foul and unhealthy camps, from which they never fully recovered. But the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McLAUGHLIN] should not forget that the House passed a similar bill on three different occasions, and each time was turned down by the Senate. I am not saying this is a just bill to these widows who have thus suffered, but to me it appears the best possible bill which the Senate will accept, and my amendment simply tends to clarify the language. I have great respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY], for he has made a special study of pension matters, and if he tells the House that the Pension Department has construed this very language as indicated by my proposed amendment, I shall not further press the amendment.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will be voted down, and trust when the gentleman from Michigan offers his amendment it will be voted down.

So far as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is concerned, I do not think it is necessary. The Pension Bureau has construed similar language, so that I do not think there can be any question that the $250 per year income mentioned is in addition to the income derived from the woman's daily labor.

I think the amendment is unnecessary; but another reason why I ask that it be voted down is that the friends of this legislation are anxious to insure the passage of this bill.

The Members of the House know the history of this struggle to secure pensions for widows of the Spanish-American War veterans. The bills have always died in the Senate. We could get them through the House because of our rules, which would permit us to shut off debate and get action. Now, for the first time, a bill has been put through the Senate, and I ask the friends of this legislation to refrain from carrying amendments, in order that we may pass this bill to-night and send it to the President.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEATING. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I think there is no doubt whatever that the gentleman is correct that, with the punctuation of this law, the comma before the word "and" sets off the additional income just as truly as if you used the two words "in addition."

Mr. KEATING. I will say to the gentleman that the objection expressed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELTY] occurred to me some time ago while I was examining this bill. I spoke to a gentleman who was supposed to be a pension expert, and, while I am not at liberty to give his name, he assured me that the decisions of the Pension Office were as I have stated them.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman would permit, I had some sympathy with the amendment that is offered by the gentleman from Michigan, but I believe that the position that the author of the bill has taken——

Mr. KEATING. I am merely acting on behalf of my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEY], who is chairman of the committee, who is not able to be here to-day on account of illness.

Mr. FESS. I will modify my statement and say the bill that is now under consideration. The statement that has been made by the gentleman from Colorado, I think, is very pertinent, in view of the fact that the House has passed this three times. We have been unable to have it acted upon in another body, and therefore I think it very wise that it be passed without amendment, if possible.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, in view of the gentleman's statement that the words "in addition" will add nothing to the force, but it would mean what it would then mean, I am going to vote against that amendment.

Mr. KEATING. I hope the gentleman will have no cause to regret it.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the opinion of Members of the House here that it does carry the same force, I withdraw my amendment, for, as indicated by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING], who is in charge of the bill, it would be best to pass the bill without the crossing of a "t" or the dotting of an "i," for this bill is similar to the one heretofore passed on three different occasions by the House, and since the Senate has passed the same we should let well enough alone and be thankful, even though Congress has granted a pension of $25 to widows of the Civil War.

However, it does seem an injustice to see a widow of the Spanish-American War, with a family to keep, only receiving $12 per month, and thus be compelled to be away from home and earn her own living as long as the children needed a mother's care. I do hope that this bill will pass the House.

It has been 20 years since the boys responded to a call of their country, and at no time did they ask any legislation in the way of pension for themselves, but they do ask that the country see that their widows and minor children should not suffer and be thrown on charity when they are no more.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment, as indicated, and hope that this bill will pass the House just as it came from the Senate, so that it can not be defeated in conference.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 8 and 9, strike out the following words: "Without means of support other than her daily labor, and an actual net income not exceeding $250 per year."

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I dislike very much to be in the position of seeming to oppose this bill or endanger its passage, but I very much object to passing a measure even under those circumstances with a provision in it which is very objectionable. I think those lines should be stricken out. It is hard to believe the Senate would refuse to accept the House amendment or that the passage of the bill would be delayed if it were amended as I think it ought to be. Now, every Member here has had more or less experience with pension matters. The older Members—those longer in service, I mean—will remember that the pension laws, not those in force now but some of those formerly in force, contained a provision that the widow was denied a pension unless she could show that her annual income was below $250. They all remember, too, how much trouble it caused. I had several of those cases. I have had hundreds of pension cases altogether, but the few involving widows' incomes caused more trouble than all the rest, and I believe that has been the experience of others. There is no more disagreeable fact to establish, no fact more difficult to establish, no investigation that causes more difference of opinion, ill feeling, than the matter of going into the income of an applicant, the appraisal of the property, the determination of the rental value, what did you do with this money, how much did you expend on repairs, and why did you do it, and why did you not carry it to net income, and all that. All can be obviated by striking out those words. And in common justice to the widows of the soldiers of the Spanish War and that they may be placed on an equal footing with the widows of soldiers of other wars I insist that those words have no place in this bill. I can not believe that the Senate would object to the amendment. I can not believe that it would delay the passage of this bill one hour, but just take time enough to have it called to the attention of the Senate and the conferees fix up the matter.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me there?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I will.

Mr. LANGLEY. It strikes me the Senate must have had some reason for putting that language in.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Heretofore, or in other bills, the House has put in a similar provision. The committees of the House have reported bills with similar provisions and the House has always rejected them.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am in some sympathy with the gentleman's argument, but I am afraid it will delay this bill.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Let it be delayed so that it can be corrected, but final passage will not be in danger.

Mr. LANGLEY. I would rather see it speedily passed, and then it can be fixed later.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It was stated yesterday by several Senators that we are to be in session until October without intermission, and we will have plenty of time. Let this bill be right.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I yield.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. To my certain knowledge the gentleman has been present through several Congresses in which this bill regularly came up and probably has, like myself, voted for it three times running now.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. And the gentleman, as an experienced legislator, knows, whatever might be the academic judgment of the majority of the Senate, when the bill as he would perfect it would be before the Senators, the very delicacy of legislation under this old Dome is in getting a bill around where anybody will consider it at all. That is the particular obstacle, it might be suggested, if it were not against the rules to say so, that is against us in another Chamber.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The bill will go to conference, and undoubtedly the conferees of each House will report an agreement to this amendment. And whoever heard of a conference on a pension-bill report being held up?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That is, one of any consequence. I do not believe for a moment that this bill will be held up.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Then vote for it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not want to vote for something that we will not get when we can vote for something we will get.

Mr. CARY. Does the gentleman think that we can change that at the next session rather than doing it now and not delay this bill?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, it will be observed that this bill carries $4 a month more to the Spanish-American War widows than the first bill that Congress enacted making provision for the payment of pensions to the widows of the Civil War—a very generous increase. That bill was passed when the Treasury of the United States was in comparatively good condition. We were at peace. To-day we are at war, and people are called upon to buy bonds, and thrift stamps, and war-savings stamps, and are called upon to pay heavy taxes in order to carry on the war and meet the ordinary expenses of the Government. I think, when we pass a law of this kind, the provisions of the law, the safeguards that are thrown about it, should take those things into consideration, and I am very glad that the bill which has been reported does provide that the widow who does not need the pension should not at this time be paid the pension. I think they have made a wise discrimination. We ought not do the unnecessary thing now.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with regard to sending this bill to conference, I think we ought to pass it as it is, without the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," if we are really in favor of this legislation. [Applause.] We could improve it by amendment, but we might jeopardize its passage by such action. You send it to conference and you may not have a bill during this session. We ought to pass it now. There are other objections to the bill that I would like to see corrected. I have some misgivings as to whether the amount any such widow might receive for daily labor would be included in the $250. But I am informed by the chairman that the committee that reported this bill had considered this matter and that there was no question but that a widow would be entitled to this pension if she had an income of $1,000 a year from personal services or for her daily labor, if she had an income of $250 or less from other sources. At any rate, this seems to be the desire and intention of Congress. In determining the question as to whether a widow is entitled to a pension under this act, the amount such widow receives for personal services is not to be considered. That seems to be agreed to. And therefore I am inclined to think we ought to pass the bill as it has been reported by the committee and let it become a law. If the thing that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN] complains of does become burdensome, after this war is over, when the Treasury is in a little better condition, if it is thought wise to give a pension to a widow of such a soldier, even though she have an income of $5,000 a year, it can be taken care of then. I think, under these conditions, the committee has wisely made some limit as to payment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed or due such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I move to strike out, on lines 10, 11, and 12, page 3, the following words, "a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions," and insert in lieu thereof "any sum or fee therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAKER: Page 3, lines 10, 11, and 12, after the word "claim," in line 10, strike out the following: "a sum greater than $10, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "any sum or fee therefor."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Iowa made an appealing statement that if you amend the bill, cross a "t" or dot an "i," you would be sure to lose the bill, and that no opportunity should be had for an amendment. There is all reason why the proper amendment should be allowed. The rest of us are in favor of this legislation. There is no question about it. But there is no possible excuse to-day under the procedure of the Pension Bureau, where claims are prepared and made out, where the affidavits are prepared and where Members of Congress look after the cases, and where there is no expense to the applicant, for having $10 taken from the widow or the minor child. It is wholly unjustifiable.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. RAKER. In just a moment. No man under the pension law to-day can justify a charge of $10 or any other sum to the widow of any soldier under the present procedure of the Pension Bureau.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Not just at present. Every assistance is given to them to secure the pension. This $10 is solely and entirely for the purpose of maintaining bureaus here in Washington for the purpose of taking out of these widows' portions $10, and nothing else. The Government is appropriating this money for the pension attorneys. The time has come when that sort of a provision ought to be taken out of these pension bills. There can be no justification for it. There is no reason for it. There is no occasion for it; and instead of the amendment that I offer here being a charge, it strikes out the permission of a fee and makes it a felony for a man to retain or charge any sum for assisting or preparing the papers.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Any attorney, any notary public, anyone in a clerical position is always ready and willing to assist the claimant in getting her papers properly made out so she can get her money. There is no question about it. There is no doubt in it. This is clean graft to the lawyer and to the firms that are here in Washington grafting from these widows. I am using my words advisedly, and the Members of this House know it.

Now I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. This is a voluntary provision. You do not have to employ an attorney. There are many widows in my district who will not have to employ an attorney.

Mr. RAKER. Why not vote to strike it out?

Mr. LANGLEY. I would if it were not for the danger of preventing the early passage of this bill.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, we are here for several months. We are not going to adjourn. We are here for proper legislation, and there is no reason for robbing these widows out of this $10. It is wrong and should be stopped. There can be no justification for it.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. BARNHART. If the gentleman struck out this provision with the safeguards that are placed about it, would not the grafting lawyers be able to take any sort of sum from these widows?

Mr. RAKER. No; not with the language that follows. It says:

That no agent, attorney, or other person engaged in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any claim under the provisions of this act shall, directly or indirectly, contract for, demand, receive, or retain for such services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting such claim—

Any sum or fee therefor. Now, any "such person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension or claim allowed due such pensioner or claimant under this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor," and so forth. That is as it ought to be. Ninety-nine per cent of the claims are voluntarily presented now. But I want to tell you the agent sends out the word, and when you in your district do the work for them Mr. Pension Agent draws down $10 for the work that you do. That is what the situation is.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The gentleman still believes that "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush"?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I believe that "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush," but I do not think this House can justify taking illegitimately $10 away from these widows.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I am talking about a bird "in the bush." Does the gentleman believe that "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush"? [Laughter.]

Mr. RAKER. Oh, that trite old saying, that old, nonsensical provision, amounts to nothing. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. What I am afraid of is that the gentleman's cross-eyed amendment will never find its way back from the Senate.

Mr. RAKER. If it is adopted, it will get back all right. It is the same old cry. If you do not give these fellows just what they demand, then the cry is raised that to amend the bill properly it might endanger its passage. That is moonshine, pure and simple. I want this legislation to pass and become a law. To correct any glaring errors in it is the duty of every Member and the business of the committee and the House. Because the wrong is carried in prior laws it is no reason that it should be continued in this. There is no better time to lop off this "little graft" on the widows and minors than at the present time. I am strongly for this bill and shall vote for it, would like to see this amendment adopted, and then the bill would be in fine shape.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. RAKER. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 9, noes 43.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that the bill pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 4444) to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the war with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the bill was passed.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed and move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, no quorum!

Mr. SIMS. You are on the Water Power Committee. Are you going to do that sort of a job?

Mr. RAKER. I am going to make a point of no quorum when I want to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California makes a point of no quorum. The Chair will count.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEATING. In case the Chair would find a quorum is not present, would the vote come on the bill? The Chair had declared the bill passed, and I had started to make a motion to reconsider and lay on the table when the gentleman from California interposed the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. What is it that the gentleman wants to know?

Mr. KEATING. I want to know, if a quorum is not present, whether a vote will come on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it is an automatic call.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FOSTER. If a quorum does not develop the bill fails?

The SPEAKER. We will stay here and get a quorum.

Mr. RAKER. There is a quorum here, and we should spend whatever time is necessary.

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. SCOTT of Michigan. Do I understand the Speaker to say that he had not indicated that the bill had passed?

The SPEAKER. Oh, no. The Chair did not say anything of the sort. He said it had passed, and immediately the gentleman from California raised the point of no quorum. It simply precipitates an automatic roll call. There are only 110 Members here, not a quorum, and the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on the passage of the bill. Those in favor of the passage of the bill will answer "yea" when their names are called; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 228, nays 7, answered "present" 3, not voting 193, as follows:

On this vote:

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island (for) with Mr. HELM (against).

Mr. HELM. Mr. Speaker, how am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. In the negative.

Mr. HELM. I am paired with the gentleman from Rhode Island, Mr. KENNEDY, and I desire to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, my colleague Mr. DALE of Vermont is unavoidably absent. If present, I am certain he would vote "yea."

Mr. MAPES. I was requested by my colleague Mr. CRAMTON to say that if he were present on this roll call he would vote "yea."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The bill is passed.

On motion of Mr. KEATING, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I call from the Speaker's table H. R. 12100 and move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 12100) to amend the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes," with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. What is the legislative parliamentary status of this bill?

Mr. ALEXANDER. The House passed the bill and it comes back here with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. Does any Senate amendment require action in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. ALEXANDER. It does not.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what this bill is.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is a bill that passed the House a few days ago amending the shipping act. The purpose of it is in the main to prevent American ships passing to a foreign flag without the consent of the Government, through the Shipping Board, and also to give the Government control over the shipyards and other shipbuilding facilities used in building ships. The first amendment the Senate made to the bill is on page 5, subdivision "c," where the House prohibited the entering "into any contract, agreement, or understanding to construct a vessel within the United States for or to be delivered to any person not a citizen of the United States," and the Senate added this language: "without expressly stipulating that such construction shall not begin until after the war or emergency proclaimed by the President has ended."

Mr. CANNON. I have not got a bill with the Senate amendments.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The bill has not been printed with the Senate amendments.

Mr. CANNON. I think it ought to be printed.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is a privileged bill and was reported back to the House to-day.

Mr. CANNON. It may be a privileged bill, but what the gentleman has said is just so much Greek to me. It is familiar to the gentleman, but I doubt if there are a dozen men in the House who recollect, in the first place, what was in the bill as it passed the House, and, second, who know what the amendments do.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It liberalizes the provisions of the House bill to this extent: Under the Senate amendment American shipyards may contract to build ships for foreign account provided they expressly stipulate that such construction shall not begin until the war or the emergency has ended. As the bill passed the House, shipyards were prohibited from entering into any contract or agreement or understanding to construct a vessel in the United States to be delivered to any person not a citizen of the United States. The Senate amendments provided that they may enter into a contract, provided it is expressly stipulated that the construction should not begin until after the war or the emergency has ended. As we passed the bill, they could not enter into the contract at all.

Mr. CANNON. This allows them to enter into a contract?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; but it expressly stipulates that they shall not enter into the construction until the emergency is over.

Mr. CANNON. That is one amendment. What is the next?

Mr. ALEXANDER. On page 7 the House bill provided:

Any such sale, mortgage, lease, charter, delivery, transfer, documentation, or agreement therefor shall be void, whether made within or without the United States, and any consideration paid therefor or deposited in connection therewith shall be recoverable at the suit of the person who has paid or deposited the same, or of his successors or assigns, after the tender of such vessel, shipyard, dry dock, shipbuilding or ship-repairing plant or facilities, or interest therein, or of such stocks, bonds, or other securities, to the person entitled thereto, or after forfeiture thereof to the United States—

And the Senate added this language—

unless the person to whom the consideration was paid, or in whose interest it was deposited, entered into the transaction in the honest belief that the person who paid or deposited such consideration was a citizen of the United States.

The other Senate amendments are merely verbal.

At the bottom of page 7 the word "or" is stricken out; its insertion was a typographical error. Then in line 23, page 8, the word "said" is inserted to make the reference to sections 9 and 37 more specific.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I note that in the print of the bill that we have the language in italics is the language of the two Senate amendments as reported to the Senate by the committee of the Senate. Now, what is there that we can get to show us the bill as it passed the Senate?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have examined the engrossed bill as it passed the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. And it contains the identical amendments as reported to the Senate?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Now, this language on page 7 says—

unless the person to whom the consideration was paid, or in whose interest it was deposited, entered into the transaction in the honest belief that the person who paid or deposited such consideration was a citizen of the United States.

That will, it would seem, destroy or nullify the rest of the section. He is not put on his guard and there is nothing for him to inquire about. He can go into the transaction and say that he honestly believed the man was a citizen of the United States, and that is enough to absolve him.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I do not think any man would do anything prohibited here and take those chances unless he was acting in good faith.

Mr. WALSH. If he says he was acting in good faith, and under the provisions of the bill if he says he had an honest belief, that ends it, whether there was any justification for him to have had that belief or not.

It seems to me that the language used in this amendment is rather unfortunate in exempting the party receiving this consideration from the operations of the act, if he simply says he had an honest belief that the person who paid or deposited the consideration was a citizen of the United States. He may have that honest belief as the result of collusion between the other parties, of which he has no knowledge.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I hardly think that is true. Of course, if the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries had framed that amendment I think they would have framed it in happier language, but it was framed by the Committee on Commerce in the Senate, and they reported it out of the committee in that form and it was agreed to in the Senate, and while it does not meet my entire approval, yet the legal department of the Shipping Board feel that it is not so serious that the bill should be sent to conference upon that account.

Mr. WALSH. I have seen bills sent to conference for matters of less consequence.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I have advised with the members of my committee about it, those who are here, and who would be members of the conference committee, and we have agreed that it is advisable to take the course that I have indicated.

Mr. WALSH. As I understand the gentleman, he thinks that this language is not strictly necessary and that there is no real need for adding to the provision as reported by his committee.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Senate committee thought so——

Mr. WALSH. No; but I am talking about the gentleman's committee.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And their idea was to protect the innocent purchaser, and there is reason why that may be done; but they——

Mr. WALSH. If this measure went to conference, does not the gentleman think that the idea sought to be expressed in this language might be incorporated in the bill in language that would be a little more definite and would not permit opportunities for fraud.

Mr. ALEXANDER. As I said to the gentleman, I think if the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries had framed the language it would have been happier and clearer.

Mr. WALSH. I will say to the gentleman that his committee has brought some very important measures into this House and they have been very carefully phrased and have been reported after careful consideration. It does not seem that we ought to clutter up a bill which was very carefully prepared by his committee, by language framed loosely somewhere else, and I am sorry the gentleman did not ask to have this measure go to conference.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I would like to ask the gentleman from Missouri if he is sure that this amendment proposed by the committee was adopted by the Senate.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I know it was. I have examined the report.

Mr. TOWNER. I did not know whether the gentleman knew it or not.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly; it was adopted by the Senate.

Mr. TOWNER. There is nothing before the House to show that the amendment was adopted by the Senate.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The Senate bill is here and I have examined the engrossed copy and the report accompanying it, and there is no doubt about it, in my mind.

Mr. TOWNER. But that is not available to Members of the House. What I wanted to call attention to, and I think it is a very serious matter, is this: Two or three times bills have been sent over in just the condition that this is in. We have been taking things on faith. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] has made a very complete explanation. I have no objection whatever in this particular case, but I am quite sure that he will agree with me that these bills ought not to be passed on by the House unless they have the opportunity of really knowing what are the amendments proposed, and the only way that this can be done is by providing that they shall be printed as Senate amendments and adopted by the Senate. Then the House may have the right to consider them and know what they mean and understand their effect. We do not always have the benefit of such complete and satisfactory explanations as has been made by the chairman of the committee, but what we ought to have in all cases are the amendments of the Senate just as they have been made, so that the House may really see them and know what they are.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I agree with the gentleman, but the rules do not provide that the bill shall be printed showing the Senate amendments unless it is referred to the committee. The rules should provide that bills shall be printed with the Senate amendments when they come over from the Senate to the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WELTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill S. 4444.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House grant general leave to Members to extend their remarks on the pension bill (S. 4444) which has just been passed for three legislative days.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend and revise my own remarks on that bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. BARNHART Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN], the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS], the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BARNHART], and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROBBINS] all make the same request. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I shall object unless the request is so framed as to have the extensions made within five legislative days.

The SPEAKER. The gentlemen ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks upon the pension bill just passed within five legislative days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419, the water-power bill.

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Will the gentleman kindly withhold that for a moment?

ADJOURNMENT TO FRIDAY, JULY 12, 1918.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I want to submit another request. Mr. Speaker, I am informed from almost every source that there are quite a number of Members of the House who will not be here and can not be here to-morrow, having made a previous engagement thinking the House would recess, and that there will be no quorum to-morrow and no business done, and I am going to ask that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet next Thursday. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the distinguished chairman of the committee has not stated the reason that a great many Members will not be here, but I have been advised that a reason for the absence of a great many Members to-morrow will also preclude their being present on Thursday.

Mr. SIMS. There will be no vote on Thursday.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I think there is a disposition on the part of Members interested in this measure to have it considered only when a quorum is present, and if there is not going to be one here Thursday there is no need of attempting to proceed with its consideration any more than to-morrow.

Mr. SIMS. In general debate, as the gentleman knows, there is never a quorum in attendance on the committee.

Mr. WALSH. You only have general debate to-morrow, and yet the gentleman says——

Mr. SIMS. Then I will change the request, Mr. Speaker, and ask that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday next for the same reason I stated at first.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain to the House and the country why he wants to adjourn over until Thursday?

Mr. SIMS. Because I understand there will not be a quorum here to-morrow or the next day.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Why not? A great many of us want to get home. Why should we adjourn over to-morrow or the next day?

Mr. SIMS. I make this upon the request of the leaders on both sides of the House, who think it will not delay anything.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is there any reason?

Mr. SIMS. There will not be a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Why not a quorum to-morrow?

Mr. SIMS. That is the explanation——

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman want me to whisper in his ear?

Mr. SIMS. It is not my personal request; I am requesting this on account of the statement made to me by the leaders on both sides.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I withdraw any objection I have.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the reason?

Mr. SIMS. I have said, I do not know how often, the information is there will be no quorum here to-morrow or the next day, and the gentleman from Massachusetts has just said the water-power bill can not proceed without a quorum.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. And if we hold a session to-morrow there will be no quorum to-morrow or the next day if we are in session?

Mr. SIMS. No matter whether we are in session or not, that is my information.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield to me, I desire to say that I am not at all mealy-mouthed about telling what the reason is. There is nothing to evade as far as I can observe. Some two or three weeks ago everyone expected there would be a recess, and accepted an invitation to go to Atlantic City to attend the national Elks' convention, a very respectable and proper thing to do, and it is very embarrassing now for Members to be held here; and, inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee on Water Power has made this request, I see no impropriety and no reason why Members should not carry out their program in the acceptance of the invitation. I am willing to accept what responsibility may devolve upon me in reference to stating the reason. Some 225 men have accepted the invitation, and it will probably break a quorum, whether we adjourn over or whether we do not.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, if I may have just a moment. I understood this bill was taken up under the express consideration that Calendar Wednesday was not to be interfered with?

The SPEAKER. That is right.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. To-morrow is Calendar Wednesday. How will that affect the arrangement that may be made about a quorum, which applies, I understand, only to the water-power bill? Now, to-morrow is Calendar Wednesday, and you do not need a quorum here to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but this request of the gentleman from Tennessee cuts out to-morrow, which is Calendar Wednesday. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Friday at 12 o'clock noon. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CONVENTION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND GREAT BRITAIN (H. DOC. NO. 1220).

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MILLER of Minnesota. I want to make a unanimous-consent request for a publication as a document, if I may have one moment's time. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that there be printed as a House document 10,000 copies, to be distributed through the document room of the House, of the message of the President of the United States setting forth the treaty which has just been ratified between the United States and Great Britain defining the military service and status of the citizens of each country resident in the other country, and together therewith the general legislation carrying this treaty into effect in the United States that was carried in the annual Army bill that was passed two or three days ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] asks unanimous consent that 10,000 copies of the President's message on the subject of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, together with legislation set out in the Army bill, be printed as a document and sent to the document room. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. On what?

Mr. CROSSER. On the general situation.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks leave to extend his remarks on general subjects.

Mr. WALSH. The state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. Reserving the right to object, are these the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. CROSSER. Yes; my remarks.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE LAW AND ITS OPERATIONS.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a document the report that was made, at the instance of the Secretary of the Treasury and Secretary of War, by Col. Robert M. Lord, Maj. Wolfe, and Mr. Herbert D. Brown, Chief of the United States Bureau of Efficiency, with reference to the war-risk insurance law and its operations. It is a report that will be of great benefit to the bureau and of great benefit to the Members of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that a report made by Col. Lord, and the others he has mentioned, be printed as a House document.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, well, Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, why does not the Treasury Department print it as a document?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know.

Mr. WALSH. They ought to do so. We ought not to be printing documents.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BARNHART. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that it be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the benefit of the Members.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419, the water-power bill, with Mr. WEBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] is recognized.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I had commenced to make a statement, but on account of questions being asked which were very pertinent, and in trying to answer them, and having made a motion to rise, I had hardly begun my speech on the general purposes and provisions of the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman pardon me if I continue those questions along the same line until the subject has been concluded, to this point, at least?

It will be recalled that we were determining, if we could, in anticipation of the purpose and the construction to be given to this law, whether a man undertaking to develop water power on one of the nonnavigable interior streams of a State would be obliged to apply to the Federal Government for authority to begin that work, or whether he could continue, as he has in the past, under the authority of the State law. Is the gentleman prepared to give any definite answer to that proposition as he is informed now?

Mr. SIMS. I will reply as I did before, that the improvement of a navigable stream, of course, depends entirely upon the consent of Congress. With reference to whether or not a proposed improvement or dam would affect adversely the navigation of the river, or that a stream which is a tributary of a navigable river, if dammed for water-power purposes, would so divert the course of the stream as to materially reduce the flow of water and its depth for navigable purposes in the navigable portion of the river of which it is a tributary would be a question of fact to be determined in each case.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. That we went over. All I want to try to ascertain—and I can see, perhaps, the hopelessness of it—is whether, if the gentleman or any of us were undertaking a private venture on those heretofore comparatively unnoticed streams, he would think that we ought to go to the Federal Government in the first instance or go along, as we have heretofore, and make our application to our State government as a matter of course?

Mr. SIMS. As set forth by the gentleman, I think there will be no danger to your State authorities giving no heed to the Federal Government.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. With that in mind, I would like to suggest this to the gentleman: On page 26, lines 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, of the bill now under consideration, there is given a definition of so-called navigable waters, as follows:

"Navigable waters" means all streams or parts of streams, and other bodies of water or parts thereof, over which Congress has jurisdiction under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States.

On page 22 of the print of this bill we have in the text of the Senate bill—which was stricken out by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in reporting the bill back to the House—a definition of navigable waters and the purposes of this act with regard to them that it seems to me might well be substituted for the definition given in the House committee's report on page 26. The text of the Senate definition is as follows.

That the term "navigable waters" as used in this act and as applied to streams shall be construed to include only such streams or parts of streams as are in their ordinary natural condition used for the transportation of persons or property in interstate or foreign commerce or which through improvement heretofore or hereafter made have been or shall become usable in such commerce. As to all other streams or parts of streams over which Congress has jurisdiction, under its authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, permission is hereby given to construct dams therein, subject, however, to removal or reconstruction, without expense to the United States unless utilized by the United States, whenever the United States enters upon the improvement thereof for the purpose of making the same usable for interstate or foreign transportation: Provided, That any person who proposes to construct a dam in any such last-mentioned stream or part of stream may make application to the Secretary of War, and thereupon may receive a permit under the conditions with all the rights and privileges herein provided for streams or parts of streams used for the transportation of persons or property in interstate or foreign commerce in their ordinary, natural, or improved condition. Nothing in this section shall be construed to grant any right to occupy or use any public land.

May I ask the gentleman, if it does not trespass upon his good nature, whether he might not be willing to accept an amendment at the proper time that substituted the Senate text on page 22 for the House definition given in lines 1 to 5, on page 26?

Mr. SIMS. In reply to the gentleman I will say that, representing the action of the committee or the majority of it, of course, I could not consent unless it had been submitted to the committee and it had agreed to it. Personally I think the definition on page 26 is hardly a definition at all. It depends on the facts with reference to each stream. The definition in the Senate bill, page 22, is more definite, but whether or not it is more accurate as a legal question is something I would not want to undertake to pass on.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Would the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion right there?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The provision on page 22, the language stricken out in the Senate bill, is the gist of a Supreme Court decision covering the case of navigable streams, already passed upon by the United States Supreme Court.

Mr. SIMS. We will have plenty of time to consider that in the amending stage of the bill.

When this matter came up I had just made a statement from the hearings that there is now, or was in 1916, 6,000,000 horsepower of developed water power in the United States; that one-half, or 3,000,000 of it, would not be affected in the slightest by the passage of this or any other bill by the Federal Government, as I understand it. This 3,000,000, or one-half of all of it, was developed on streams not navigable or not situated on the public lands. The entire amount of water power that has been developed that would be subject to this bill or its provisions now amounts to 3,000,000 horsepower. It is estimated by Mr. Merrill, chief engineer of the Forest Service of the Department of Agriculture, that there is about, as I now recall, 26,000,000 potential horsepower undeveloped in the United States. Other estimators, perhaps less accurate—and Mr. Merrill admits that it is more or less a guess—have estimated that the potential horsepower in the United States amounts to fifty or sixty millions. It is also estimated that there is fifty or sixty millions undeveloped horsepower in the Dominion of Canada.

The power shortage in the United States has become exceedingly acute. There is a greater demand for the increase of mechanical power at this time than there has ever been before in the United States. It is more acute now, perhops, during the war than it will ever be again, unless there is another war. But it will grow no less. The question of the development of hydroelectric power means that you are converting water power for the purpose of transmission, for the purpose of shipment, so to speak. Water power is just as potential, just as needful, and just as serviceable as is electric power. But raw material, in the first place, would have to be shipped, transported to the site of the water power, and finished products or manufactured products would then have to be transported from the water power to the markets. Therefore by converting water power into electric power we can avoid a great drain upon the traffic facilities of the country, the railroads and the rivers, for the reason that you transport the energy to the place where perhaps the raw material may be in large supply, possibly where it is cheaper to transport the raw material, if it has to be transported, than it would to transport it to the site of the water power. So, after all, this is a transportation question, a question of transportation of physical property.

For instance, here may be an iron-ore bank, a large deposit of iron, and near by, as in the case of Birmingham, Ala., large deposits of coal. If a water power exists within reach of Birmingham, although the coal may be near the iron ore, or the iron ore may be near the coal, yet if we can transmit or transport electric current by reason of the development of a water power, it can be generated cheaply, we can actually operate machinery in Birmingham near the iron ore and coal mines at a less cost than could be done if we had to transport either the coal or iron ore a short distance, or both a short distance, to the manufacturing plant. It saves an immense expenditure in motive power. Consequently the increased cost of coal alone, the great draft upon the railway motive power at present, if there was nothing else in it, would of itself constitute a very great demand for the development of hydroelectric power by the development of water powers.

Take the case on the Pacific coast. Take the State of California, where at present their entire power supply must either come from water-power produced electricity or from coal that costs $6 or $8 a ton, or fuel oil, which is now the chief supply of power in the State of California. The oil wells of California are gradually being exhausted. The supply is growing less and less every year. Hence the great necessity of an early development of additional water power in California because of the rapid exhaustion of fuel oil.

California has but few streams that are navigable on which water power can be developed, but there are a great number of water powers that can be created by impounding the waters in the mountains which are on public lands, and it is extremely necessary that we should have legislation with reference to further development of water power upon the public lands adjacent to those Western States, while the water-power development in the States east of the Mississippi River and, in fact, east of the Rocky Mountains, is confined almost altogether to navigable streams; not altogether, but those that would be immediately developed under the provisions of this bill would be those developed through power dams upon navigable streams.

The Senate bill which we are amending applied only to navigable rivers. The Adamson bill, which was passed by the House last Congress, applied only to the navigable rivers. The Ferris bill applied to the public lands only. All of which is combined in this one bill. The power shortage in the Eastern States, on the Atlantic seaboard, and where our great war industries are now located, is very great.

I will admit that ordinarily in the development of a water-power site for the manufacture of electricity the time required, first, in order to make preliminary surveys of the sites to ascertain what can be done in the way of financing the scheme, is considerable. It takes time, and it takes a long time, to build a tremendous dam. A water-power dam in some places, on some watercourses, is estimated to cost as high as $25,000,000. But there are a number of Government dams, navigation dams, dams that have been built on navigable rivers for the purpose of improving navigation, that are now unavailable simply because there is no law that permits their utilization. Those dams, or the water powers produced by Government navigation dams, can be made available immediately; that is, just as soon as the electric generating machinery and transmission wires can be constructed. The Government is getting no return, not a dollar, on the money in the navigation dams. There is a dam of that kind in Arkansas; three, I believe, in the State of Minnesota; there are three or four in the State of Ohio; perhaps one or more in Alabama, that as soon as the bill is passed and improvement made, either by the Government itself or by private capital under permit or license, as provided for in this bill, can be made available in time to be of very great benefit during the war, unless the war fortunately ends in less time than we have hope that it will end.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the chairman of the committee yield for a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am curious to know what the committee had in mind with reference to the utilization of these water powers by the Government. Is it the thought of the committee that Government use is only contemplated for war-time purposes, or is any use by the Government contemplated after the cessation of the war, in peace times?

Mr. SIMS. The bill provides for the development of water powers either by private capital or by the Government.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I know, but what thought had the committee in mind with reference to its utilization by the Government? For what purposes was it contemplated that it might be used?

Mr. SIMS. It is not limited, but naturally it is supposed that it will be utilized by the Government for Government purposes; but there is nothing in the bill that will prevent the Government from operating hydroelectric energy just as the Government itself may determine that its necessities require.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I have hop-skip-and-jumped through this bill. I want to see if my conclusion is correct. It is a bill of many pages, and I regard it as a bill of importance; but I came to the conclusion after finishing the reading that no one in the United States, except a man needing a conservator, would ever buy a bond if a private individual undertook to finance one of these improvements under all the provisions of the bill. Therefore it seems to me it is a bill in effect to promote universal Government development.

Mr. SIMS. I do not understand the gentleman from Illinois to mean that the practical effect of it will be that there will be no improvement by private capital. Is that what the gentleman means?

Mr. CANNON. Precisely. I have read the bill, and if I understand it I think it is so hedged about with provisions and exceptions, with regulation by the States and then regulation by the National Government, that it seems to me no man could finance the improvement, for the simple reason that these companies do not make these improvements with their own money. They do not finance in that way. So while the bill professes to provide for financing by individuals or by citizens, it seems to me that there will never be any of that kind of financing, and it strikes me there will be no financing at all unless it is done by the Government.

Mr. SIMS. In reply to the gentleman from Illinois, I beg to say that men who are engineers and have expert knowledge of water-power development and who know its cost and the methods of financing, I think without one exception, who have been before our committee have spoken in very high terms of the bill, and have said they think there is no question that there will be development under the bill as it is reported to the House. Besides that a member of the investment banking house of Harris, Forbes & Co. appeared before the committee and made a statement as to what his firm or bank would do.

Mr. BENJAMIN L. FAIRCHILD. Will the gentleman mention the name of the member of Harris, Forbes & Co. who appeared before the committee?

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Krauthoff, who is a very intelligent man. His statement would interest anybody. Harris, Forbes & Co. are one of the model investment banking houses of the United States, and all others that are models would act along the same line. Mr. Krauthoff stated that the firm of Harris, Forbes & Co. will not buy a bond or advance one dollar for construction purposes under this bill or under any other.

This is a broken way to discuss this subject, but after all it is a very good way to do it. The gentleman from Illinois asks a question that puts everybody's mind on the subject and that gives me an opportunity to turn to that portion of the hearing that will answer the gentleman's question. That is a very good way to do. It takes time, but we seem to have a reasonable amount of time before us. Now, I want to read to you what Mr. Krauthoff said on that very subject, as to what a good house like his will do and what they will not do with reference to financing these propositions. On page 451 of the hearings, Mr. Krauthoff says:

> I would like to give you, very briefly, some idea of the care with which we go into a public-utility situation prior to our undertaking any bond financing thereon. In the first place, the property, of course, has to be on an established and going basis. We do not finance so-called construction propositions in any stage. They have to have a record of operations and of earnings before we are interested at all. The construction-money stage has to be financed by the junior people, who get back some of their money later on through the sale of the bonds.
> The first phase of our investigation is to send out an engineer to make a report on the property, including a very conservative valuation or appraisal of the purely physical property, because this physical-property valuation is what, in the last analysis, we base our bond issue on. In other words, we figure that if our bonds are well within that valuation they are safe, other factors being equally favorable. The legal phases of the situation are gone over most carefully by our attorneys, a detailed report on its business aspects is made by a member of our organization, and the earnings are reported on and verified by our accountant.
> Then these various expert reports and opinions are taken together and discussed by the house in order to determine, in view of the facts brought out in the reports and opinions, whether it is conservative to loan on that property at all, and, if it is, what is a conservative amount for the proposed bond issue, and by what restrictions such a bond issue should be safeguarded? We have never handled a share of stock in our entire career, and we have no personal interest at stake in the junior end or any other end of the situation except, of course, from the broad standpoint of the economic advantages which will accrue to this country from the development of its enormous water-power resources, an advantage which was never more obvious than under the conditions which exist to-day. There will be plenty of other business coming to us if we do not care to take hold of any particular proposition—hydroelectric or otherwise. There is always a far greater demand for our funds than there are projects that we are willing to go into. In fact, out of all the projects that come to us I do not suppose that we handle one in ten, which means there is not one in ten that will meet all our requirements.

That is the statement from high authority, that they will not advance one dollar for construction purposes, that they will not buy a bond until the project is a completed, going, money-earning concern. At another place in the same hearing his statement is, as I now recall it, that the project must earn net twice the amount of the interest on the indebtedness before they will loan at any stage.

Now, a very proper question arises, very germane to the whole inquiry, How are we going to develop these vast and expensive water-power projects at all?

During war prices the labor to the extent it is used would perhaps cost twice what it would at any other time. Materials would cost perhaps twice what they did before the war. The construction work not only of the dam but the water-power dam, the generating machinery, transmission lines, distribution plants—all of it would cost double what it would in normal times. Therefore a project would have to be exceedingly inviting in the way of future profits to justify the investment of capital at this time in a 50-year contract. The license is not to exceed 50 years. As a matter of course, all money that is put into the construction is entitled to just as much in the way of a fair return as money put into the bonds 10 years after it is a going concern. They are just as much entitled to fair earnings on it as if it was money put into the purchase of bonds. I can not see how it is possible at this time for private capital to develop water-power construction at all with any hope of getting a fair return during the whole license period, in view of the prices they will be permitted to charge for a period of 50 years; but such projects as may be devoted to governmental activities or war purposes ought to be developed regardless of whether it will cost more or less, regardless of profits to be made on it, measured by dollars and cents, ought to be undertaken by the Government, provided it can develop them in time to be used for governmental purposes during the existence of the war.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. ESCH. The bill provides for preliminary permits not to exceed three years in order to give capital and parties interested an opportunity to demonstrate whether or not they might have a suitable location for a dam. That could go on during the period of the war, and so it would be wise to pass the bill now.

Mr. SIMS. I was coming to that as one of the reasons. Naturally the question would arise, If private capital can not now finance these developments, why pass the bill? The gentleman from Wisconsin suggests the very matter that I was going to bring before the House, that, so far as the immediate development by the installation of machinery and the actual operation of it, I do not see how it can be done by private capital; but the bill provides for issuing preliminary permits for the purpose of making investigation and surveys not to exceed three years. There is no doubt that private persons and corporations already know where all of the good projects are. These projects are not like mines of hidden gold; they are on the surface. You can see where water power exists and where one can be developed, and there is no doubt that they know every available water power in the United States at this moment. The very moment the bill is passed and a permit can be issued, the best projects will all be filed on immediately. The permits to develop will be sought immediately by those who know where these projects are, and the poor ones will not be developed at all, because the rich and great ones, the profitable ones, will make it impossible for the poor ones to operate in competition with them.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. With reference to granting permits for preliminary investigations, does the bill contemplate that only one permit can be issued on one particular site, or will more than one permit be authorized for investigation by different concerns?

Mr. SIMS. The bill, as I understand it, only authorizes the issuance of one permit at a time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That will give the party three years.

Mr. SIMS. It might extend for three years; but we provide that States and municipalities shall have the preference.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to throw the field open a little wider, so that those interested in water-power development might be on terms of equality with reference to investigations?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know whether it is practicable for two applicants to investigate at the same time. If it is, I do not see why it should not be allowed. But I know this, that those who know the good projects are going to file immediately; they will file the very moment the President signs the bill. Of course, the projects that will pay the greatest returns on the least capital will be filed on immediately, except those that may be given to States or municipalities.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The gentleman speaks about the good projects and the inferior ones, and that the good projects will be attractive and will be seized on at once because of the great returns to be made. As I understand the bill, it does not make much difference to the private investor, the private individual, who is to develop the project, because you are going to limit the returns that he can receive. You say he shall not have anything beyond a fixed return whether it is a good one or a bad one, so that the only people that are interested in this extra profit that can be made where large returns come in from the investment will be those who purchase the power from those who produce it, because, as I understand the bill, it limits the amount of returns that the individual can get.

As to all over that, he has to adopt the principle of the Ford Automobile Co., and at the end of the year, because he has made a little too much, give it back to the people who patronize him. If that be true, what difference does it make to the investor whether it is a good or bad project?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has asked a pertinent question, and one that ought to be answered. I intended to discuss that feature of the bill or any other bill that may be offered. It is utterly impossible, in my view of it, to regulate the price of the current to the consumers so as to say they shall make 5 per cent or any certain specified return upon the investment after meeting operating cost and interest upon the investment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That is what the bill provides.

Mr. SIMS. It is impracticable and impossible.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. And it is something else besides. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMS. It is always an attractive idea. It is always a catch phrase to say that we will give to the consumer the benefit of these things by regulation. There is hardly a water power in the United States that can supply its electric-current demand wholly by the use of the water-power plant, and why? In different States and different localities there are different situations, but in nearly all of the water powers the watercourses have a high-water season and a low-water season, and to build a dam high enough to impound water enough to have a head all the year round would make the initial cost so great and the interest upon the investment so great that it would materially reduce the net income. So, instead of building a dam high enough and expensive enough to impound water enough to supply all demands during the entire season, they build a lower dam, less expensive, which is sufficient in the high-water period, and in addition to that have a steam-power plant to supplement it in the low-water season, or during the peak of the load sometimes during these high-water seasons. So that when they begin to fix the price of power to the purchaser they will fix it based upon the average cost of operating the water and the steam plants as one, but that is not all.

Take Buffalo, for instance, for that is a good illustration. Niagara Falls are near Buffalo; there is tremendous power development upon the American side and also upon the Canadian side. They are both at the Falls and both have the same head. The power on the Canadian side sells at $9 per horsepower per annum, while on the American side it sells at $18 per horsepower per annum, or double the amount. You will ask, naturally, whether or not New York has a good public-service commission. New York has. Then why not give Buffalo and the American manufacturer upon the American side power as cheaply as the Canadian power plant does on the Canadian side? It comes about in this way: On the Canadian side they can furnish all of the demand for power by hydroelectric production, while on the American side they can not furnish half the demand—at least not over half—by hydroelectric development. Consequently if they fix the price for hydroelectric power generated at Niagara Falls to Buffalo and the vicinity not at what is a fair price or what would give fair earnings upon the investment, it can not furnish half the demand, because the steam-produced power could not meet it. So what do they do? The steam-produced power makes the price and the hydroelectric producer gets double what he otherwise would, and yet they have a regulating commission, and because the commission can not regulate so as to deny Buffalo and the vicinity all the power they must have, as would be the case if they were to fix the price at a fair profit to the hydroelectric producers. If such was to be the case it would drive every steam-producing electric power producer out of business, and the result would be that Buffalo and the vicinity would famish for the lack of power. You can not regulate these things so that they can not get more than a fair profit out of it unless there is electric power enough to supply the entire demand. Then we will have other troubles. What is happening now on the Canadian side? They are producing power at cost and selling it to all consumers without any profit. The hydroelectric commission of Ontario is selling power at cost. It is a community-owned power manufacturing and distributing corporation. Two hundred and twenty-six municipalities own the whole thing. What is the result? Many American manufacturers are leaving our own side, where money is cheaper and where the market is greater, because they can not compete with the price they have to pay for power in the United States with that upon the Canadian side, and they have gone over there and are manufacturing their products at least to sufficiently supply their export demand.

What else happened? Manufacturers in the United States who had to have power have actually left the United States and gone to Norway because they could buy power there at $7 per horsepower per annum. Now, you can not regulate unless you can regulate the source of the supply of power, because the most expensive producer will fix the price in spite of any State commission. Now, a man from Niagara Falls, a large manufacturer, told me that he was paying from $14 to $110 per horsepower at this time—from $14 for hydroelectric power that he had a contract for made years ago up to as high as $110 per horsepower at this time for power produced by steam on the American side. If the coal goes up, the power produced by that coal goes up. I said to this man, "How do you know how to price your products?" He said, "I take all the power I need and average the cost." His company has put up a $6,000,000 concern in Norway in order to compete with the cheap Canadian power in this country. Many manufacturers in the United States are now going over into the Province of Ontario on account of cheap power. Ontario is making a great effort to reduce the cost of power all the time in order to attract the manufacturers of this country to their Province, and a great many are leaving us.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. In view of what the gentleman says, why do you require that when the license is given to the prospective developer of power, when the license is given to him to go and develop and maintain and operate his plant, why do you specify in the license the return that he is to receive on that investment? Now, as I understood the gentleman just now, he says that can not be ascertained until at the end of the year, and then they average up the whole cost. It says:

Such surplus earnings to be paid into and held in such reserve shall be set forth in the license.

Mr. SIMS. That is reserves for depreciation or amortization.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is the maximum return which can be earned upon the net investment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Now, can you fix the maximum return?

Mr. SIMS. Suppose there is a California development. They have got a public-service commission for regulating hydroelectric power, current, and all that sort of thing. They fix it, but if you did not allow a return that would bring about a development California would be ruined, and consequently they are not going to allow it; but the cheapest produced power will make more money than the more expensive produced power when it is all needed for consumption.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The gentleman will find that this bill provides for the States to have a regulation of the price in every case where they have a commission. The only place where the Government interferes between the States is where they have not any commission, and if there is any charge of monopoly usually it is the fault of the State and not the fault of this law or the commission.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that the maximum return is not the maximum in the sense that they never can earn a rate above that amount, but it is a maximum in the sense that the commission has a right to require that a certain proportion of the return above that rate shall be put back into their surplus or into their amortization of the plant.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. To see if I get it right, there will be no incentive whatever to a man who is developing power to make any improvement in his machinery. If he has got an old, out-of-date plant that may yield him 10 per cent, if he makes any more than 10 per cent, why the Government is going to take it. Why should he undertake to develop the plant by putting in something on scientific principles that will produce far cheaper? Why should he do that? It will not be of any advantage to him if the commission is going to take it away from him and give it to somebody else. Why not run along in the old beaten path and just make his 10 per cent? It occurs to me that when you put a limit on the amount that these people can make, except, of course, to regulate the rates and practices, you put a stumbling block in the way of progress in matters of development.

Mr. SIMS. You are speaking, of course, with reference to powers developed under this bill?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Under this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Whether the United States shall have the power to say whether he shall have any at all or not. They have the power to say that.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. We do say it, and I am very much afraid you are saying it emphatically in this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Let me call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Government is not hunting up people to give them permits to make money for themselves.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Who does the Government expect the people of the country who are going to develop water power are going to work to make money for if it is not for themselves?

Mr. SIMS. If it is for development of water power not on a navigable stream or public lands, they can charge all they want for current, so far as the Government of the United States is concerned.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. We can induce people to work for a dollar a year and can induce people to make sacrifices for the public and give their services to the Government free in time of war, but I dare say that in times of peace the gentleman will find some difficulty in getting any considerable number of people in this country to invest their money in a water-power plant in order to make money for somebody else.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say to the gentleman, speaking for myself—and I will not undertake to represent the views of any other member of the committee—that I am not wearing my life out here to try to provide a general law that is simply to attract accumulated capital, especially, as Mr. CANNON said a while ago, when it is within the possibilities, when it is within the power, of the Government of the United States to develop every one of these powers on its own account, at its own expense, and sell the power at cost, like the hydroelectric commission does in Ontario, Canada.

Now, these investment bankers say, "You must give us this and that and the other, or we will not buy the bonds." I say, "You must do so-and-so, or we will not give you any opportunity to buy bonds." Now, the gentleman's question comes up with reference alone to guaranteeing and insuring the private investor that he will get back every cent he ever put in if the Government ever takes it over or allows a municipality to take it over. Now, when a licensee gets a 50-year permit, with 3 years' time in which to make a preliminary examination, with the best engineering talent in the country at his command, the gentleman need not be afraid of ever losing any money on any project that they will undertake. Besides, the increasing demand for power and the increasing cost of every kind of mechanical power, as well as electric power, is such that when the licensee gets his permit and license, which prescribes what he may earn for 50 years, maximum earnings, if the business is well managed, it will grow larger every year. The Government could not, unless it does it itself, sell the power at a fixed percentage on the investment and not ruin the communities that would have power in excess of that produced by the particular project.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. May I suggest to the gentleman that if they put in the improved machinery he speaks of, it increases the earning power, and they earn the extra per cent on the money they put in the machinery just the same as they did on the other class of machinery. By putting it in they get a per cent on that right along, just as much as they would on the original investment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I do not know whether they would or not. Here you have an old plant, one that is inefficient, and it does not develop the power that it ought to develop.

Mr. SIMS. Why do you put in an old, inefficient plant?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Because when we put it in we did not know any better. They put it in at Niagara when they first started there, and they developed 20 horsepower for so many cubic feet. That has not been so many years ago. By virtue of improvements that have been made in machinery they can now produce the same horsepower on one-half the cubic feet of water.

Mr. SINNOTT. This provides that the commission may require the power company to operate its plant efficiently, to make the necessary repairs and replacements for that purpose, and guard against the obsolescence that the gentleman referred to.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. And who will have any incentive to ascertain which is the most efficient? It occurs to me that it takes the initiative away from the private investor—from the individual. It destroys the initiative to improve, and it leaves it entirely with the commission. The man who invests his money is getting his return, and it does not make any difference to him whether he has a better machine or not.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, may I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi that perhaps he and I are thinking along the same line as to the possible purpose of this bill? It seems to squint at a much-proposed and often-advocated theory of Government ownership of public utilities and natural resources, but first permitting private capital to develop those natural resources at its own expense to the point where it would be profitable for the Government to take them over.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; that is about all I am doing. I can not refuse my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is very generous. I assume that he will not be able to complete his very interesting remarks this afternoon, and it seems as though we should have more Members here listening to him and to the statement he is making. Considering the fact that he is the chairman of this special committee, I think it is to be regretted that more Members have not remained to listen to the opening statement by him on this important measure.

Mr. SIMS. May I have five minutes to explain that Niagara matter to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. WALSH. It is now 5 minutes to 5.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS] talks about Niagara. They put in their generating plant with a head of 165 feet. One company, as I am told, on the American side has a surplus of $5,000,000 and the other a surplus of $1,000,000. On the other side the Hydroelectric Commission of Ontario has bought out the largest concern over there, and are proposing scrapping it and building an enormous ship canal on that side and expect to put up a new plant near Lewistown with a 306-foot head, and the increased power that they have down there with the same amount of water enables them to throw away the vast investment they have up at the Falls and make money on the whole investment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the Canadian Government put any limitation on the amount that the developers shall charge in their rates?

Mr. SIMS. That is done by the power commission, which sells at cost.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does it provide for the redistribution of the excess?

Mr. SIMS. No. They have been reducing the cost all the time.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. We did not understand whether, when a plant was worthless, thrown away, and a new plant put in, the cost of both plants would be that upon which the return would be allowed by the commission.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly not. If they wear out one plant in making money and buy a new one, I do not see why they should continue to make money on the old investment when they are making more money on the new one than they did on the old one.

Mr. FAIRFIELD. I do not think that ought to be true, according to the statement made by the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SIMS. It ought not to be true.

Mr. Chairman, I am now at a good stopping place and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is anxious that I have a good audience on Friday, and therefore I will discontinue my remarks and move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. WALSH. I want to say to the gentleman that I think that it is due to him as chairman of the committee that there should be a larger audience here to listen to his discussion of the bill. I did not make the suggestion on my own account. I regard his statement as of great interest.

Mr. SIMS. I understand the gentleman's suggestion was not made on his own account. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a statement of not over one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks leave to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. This afternoon I was unavoidably absent during the time the Spanish War widows' pension bill was under consideration. I was out of the Chamber on important business. Had I been present I would have voted for the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I ask a moment to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER. How much—two minutes?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, my absence, like that of the gentleman from California, was unavoidable, as I went to visit a department on business for a constituent from whom I received a very important letter. Before going I went to the desk of the pair clerk and was paired. I left the Chamber knowing that under the unanimous-consent agreement the general debate on the water-power bill was to continue certainly all of the remainder of this day, and in all probability all of some succeeding days, during which no vote would be taken. But I was greatly surprised on my return a few minutes ago to know that during my absence the Spanish War widows' pension bill had in a most unusual manner been voted on. In three previous Congresses I voted for a similar bill, and would of course have voted to pass the bill to-day had I been present. I did as much, I think, as did any other gentleman to get the bill before the House this time and to secure its passage.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I am aware of the gentleman's earnest desire for the enactment of this legislation, and I think it is unfortunate for the gentleman's record that he was not here when the bill was passed. He has been agitating and criticizing me for objecting to it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Why, Mr. Speaker, that is entirely gratuitous, because during the debate on Friday last I did not criticize the gentleman at all. I simply urged him not to object to the consideration of the bill. I did not criticize his action. Knowing how apt the gentleman is to become irascible when criticized, I refrained from anything of the kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. FESS. I would like to testify to my friend's urgency on this measure, because he asked me as a member of the Committee on Rules if I would not assist in bringing it out, and we then went into the Chamber and brought it out.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 313. Joint resolution providing for the disposition of moneys represented in the Alfred Bernard Nobel peace prize awarded in 1906.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, under its previous order, until Friday, July 12, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SIEGEL: A bill (H. R. 12702) to make the French national holiday a legal holiday in the United States of America; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HAMILL: A bill (H. R. 12703) granting transportation rates of 1 cent per mile to and from their home towns for soldiers and sailors and nurses on furlough during the period of the war and for six months thereafter; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HADLEY: Resolution (H. Res. 418) directing the United States Food Administration to furnish certain information to the House of Representatives; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. DALE of New York: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Louisiana, favoring the expansion and development of the Department of Commerce; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. DALE of New York: Resolution of the union-label trades department of the American Federation of Labor, urging the repeal of the zone system as applied to second-class mail; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, resolution of the Washington Heights Taxpayers' Association, of New York City, urging the passage of the bill introduced by Congressman SMITH for two ice-breaking vessels for New York Harbor; also, memorial of the Philip N. Cassidy Democratic Association, favoring 1-cent mileage for sailors and soldiers; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, resolution of the Central Labor Union of Brooklyn and Queens, relative to the Mooney trial; also, petition of citizens of Watertown, N. Y., against war prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ESCH: Petition of bankers of Monroe County, Wis., pledging our loyalty and support to the Nation; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LINTHICUM: Petition of William Deiches & Co., of Baltimore, Md., favoring the repeal of zone law affecting mailing rates on periodicals; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, petition of Conrad Anschutz, for the Henry W. Lawton Camp, No. 5, Spanish-American War Veterans, favoring Senate bill 4444; to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, petition of the Mercantile Trust & Deposit Co., the Maryland Bankers' Association, and the Fidelity Trust Co., all of Baltimore, Md., against the passage of Senate bill 4426; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. LONERGAN: Petition of Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Connecticut, favoring war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LUFKIN: Memorial of Lithuanians of Haverhill, Mass., pledging unswerving allegiance to the United States and loyal support of its cause in the present war; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MAGEE: Memorial of the Free Methodist Church, of Syracuse, N. Y., favoring war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, petition of Mrs. William A. Glasgow and other residents of the village of Fabius, N. Y., favoring war prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MEEKER: Petition of the International Brotherhood of Foundry Employees, of St. Louis, Mo., favoring bill for Government control of all telegraph companies; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PRATT: Petition for national war prohibition signed by numerous residents of Pine Valley, Chemung County, N. Y.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TEMPLE: Petition of P. D. Smith, of New Castle, Pa., favoring passage of war-time prohibition; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. WINSLOW: Resolution of loyalty to the Government of the United States adopted by the Lithuanian residents of Worcester, Mass., in convention assembled on July 4, 1918; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 10, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, day by day we call upon Thy name that we may be imbued with wisdom from on high and be workmen that need not be ashamed. We are not satisfied that our Nation expresses the highest achievements of human philosophy in government; we desire at the end to accomplish the will of God. Before us is the great achievement, working together with God in the accomplishment of a great design. Lead us this day with wisdom and grace, with gentleness, with forbearance, and with courage, that we may do Thy will, and that we may have Thy sanction and blessing upon the work of our hands. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MOVEMENT OF SOLDIERS' MAIL (S. DOC. NO. 266).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, certain information covering the operation of the War Department as to the movement of the mails to and from our troops and auxiliaries abroad, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS.

Mr. FERNALD presented a petition of Victory Lodge, No. 308, Independent Order of Good Templars, of Lisbon Falls, Me., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KNOX presented a petition of sundry citizens of Westmoreland County, Pa., and a petition of sundry citizens of Beaver County, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide for the substitution of the oath required of enlisted men for the oath required of officers, in order to relieve those who object on conscientious grounds to the oath prescribed by law for officers, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Marion Center, McKees Rocks, Oakdale, Moon Run, Cliff Mine, and Carnegie, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Nanticoke, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HALE presented a petition of Victory Lodge, No. 308, Independent Order of Good Templars, of Lisbon Falls, Me., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COLT presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from sundry citizens of Greater Providence, R. I., praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which was ordered to lie on the table.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS TO MEXICAN EDITORS (S. DOC. NO. 264).

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which I report from the Committee on Printing, to publish the address made by the President of the United States to the visiting editors from the Republic of Mexico. I had it referred to the committee. If I had known at the time, and in the confusion could have heard distinctly, I would not have objected to its consideration; but I am glad it has gone through the course it has. It went to the committee and is favorably reported, and the estimated cost is $10.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PENROSE. Let it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 281), as follows:

Resolved, That the address made by the President of the United States to the Mexican editors at the White House on June 7, 1918, be printed as a Senate document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the printing of the address, but I wish to state that the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] in presenting the address and asking that it be printed as a public document wanted to have it printed for the purpose of sending it into Mexico. If I am informed correctly, all the papers of Mexico have already published this address, together with another letter that was sent to Mexico in parallel columns. I do not think that the address itself has done any good in Mexico, and I think that it ought to be published for use in the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The Senator is misinformed about the purpose of the Senator from California. As I understand it, many of the business interests connected with interests in Mexico are writing for this document, so that their agents in Mexico may distribute the document, as far as possible, to those with whom they come in contact, and I thought it a very wise provision that such a distribution should be made of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is agreed to.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I report the following joint resolution favorably from the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the report will go to the calendar.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope that the joint resolution will be read. I do not know what it is about.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not either, but I suspect what it is about.

Mr. SIMMONS. Let us have our suspicions verified.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the joint resolution by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor.

Mr. SIMMONS. So far as I am concerned, that is a sufficient reading.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I renew my objection, if it is necessary to do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the joint resolution will go to the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follow:

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 4818) granting a pension to Jenny E. Aisenman; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. PENROSE:

A bill (S. 4819) granting an increase of pension to Eliza M. Miller; and

A bill (S. 4820) granting an increase of pension to Faion Brady; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FERNALD:

A bill (S. 4821) granting an increase of pension to Charles H. Skillings (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Michigan:

A bill (S. 4822) granting an increase of pension to Caroline E. Sweet; to the Committee on Pensions.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR COLT (S. DOC. NO. 265).

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I wish to ask consent to have printed as a public document the address of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] delivered at Bristol, R. I., on the Fourth of July. I think it is one of the most patriotic addresses that has been delivered on a war subject. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think it ought to be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. KENYON. Very well; I will ask that it go to the Senator's committee.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Let it go there, and there will be a resolution reported out, and the regular orderly proceeding had about it. In that way the committee can keep charge of such matters.

Mr. KENYON. I shall be very glad to do that. I move that the address delivered by Senator COLT on the Fourth of July, at Bristol, R. I., be printed as a public document, and ask that the motion be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand the request is to print the speech of a Senator delivered outside of the Chamber as a public document, and not in the RECORD.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; as a public document. I did not ask to have it printed in the RECORD, because I think the Senator from Arizona objects to that course, and it ought to be stopped.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to ask the chairman of the committee if we can not agree to the request without having the matter go to the committee. It has always been done in the past when one of our own body makes a speech outside of the Chamber and a request is made that it be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I have not the slightest doubt that it has always been done, and I would be the last man to invade that rule. I will make a report by sundown, as I had intended to do if the request was put before the committee, but I withdraw my objection.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Arizona withdraws his objection, and I make my request for unanimous consent that the address be printed as a public document.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am not going to object, but I am going to express my own preference that it should be printed in the RECORD, because if printed as a public document it is gone; when a Senator wants it he does not know where to find it unless he goes hunting in some library somewhere, and he does not know whether he will find it there or not; but if printed in the RECORD a Senator knows the speech was printed and he can find it and make use of it, and some use will be made of it. Personally I would much prefer to have it printed in the RECORD than printed as a public document. I very seldom see these public documents that we order printed, but I do know where to find something in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. However, I am not going to object.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. A Senator looks into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to find what has been said in the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not think so at all.

Mr. KENYON. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD ought to be for the proceedings of Congress. I thoroughly indorse the position the Senator from Arizona takes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

LETTER FROM MR. HERBERT HOOVER.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am in receipt of a letter from the Food Administrator, Mr. Herbert Hoover, in reply to a letter which I transmitted to him in connection with price fixing by the Government as it may affect the revenue of the Government. The letter is very carefully written and a very valuable contribution to the problem, and I think it is a letter that the Members of the Senate and House and the people of the country will be greatly interested in.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I should like to have order, so that we can hear the Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. We are unable to hear the Senator on this side of the aisle.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair can not hear. The Senate will be in order.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated that I am in receipt of a letter from the Food Administrator, Mr. Hoover, in reply to a letter which I transmitted to him with reference to price fixing by the Government in connection with the revenue to be derived from any levy that we may impose. I think the discussion of the question by Mr. Hoover, and it is a careful, well-considered discussion, will be of great interest and value to Senators and Members of the House and to the country. I ask unanimous consent that this letter be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for printing in the RECORD the letter referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. PENROSE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Henderson	Norris	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Benet	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Kellogg	Penrose	Smoot
Calder	Kendrick	Pittman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Poindexter	Swanson
Colt	King	Pomerene	Thomas
Culberson	Knox	Ransdell	Thompson
Curtis	Lenroot	Reed	Trammell
Fernald	McKellar	Saulsbury	Vardaman
France	Martin	Shafroth	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	Myers	Sheppard	Watson
Hale	Nelson	Shields
Harding	New	Simmons

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to announce the temporary absence of my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] on official business.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to state that the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] is absent on official business. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. ASHURST] is detained by illness in his family.

Mr. BECKHAM. My colleague, the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], is detained by illness.

Mr. KING. I wish to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is detained on account of death in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

The Chair stated the request of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to print a certain communication in the RECORD, and before knowing whether any objection would be made, the absence of a quorum was suggested. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES FOOD ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, July 8, 1918.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have before me your kind letter asking that I should, before leaving, give to you, for your consideration in connection with impending tax legislation, such views as I have been able to formulate in our experience upon the questions of profiteering. Because of the considerable emotion often introduced into these discussions, it seems to me that it is worth while to distinguish between the moral and economic phases. On the moral side the Nation is endeavoring to draw a distinction between a profit commensurate with the effort or capital employed and stimulative to enterprise and production, and the profit that is abnormally large due to war conditions. The latter, I take it, is what is meant by profiteering. Too often they are confused in discussion. Extra profits out of war are hateful. That any man taking a profit in greater measure because the goods he produces are needed for war or because of the scarcity created by war is abhorrent to all decent people. and rightly so, when the youth of the Nation are being called upon to sacrifice all that they have. I do not think it will be denied that our whole production and distribution system is based on earning of profits, and that it is a primary thing to say that the distribution system has got to proceed on this basis and that, therefore, normal profits are not immoral.

The Government is, through many departments, endeavoring to reduce profiteering through regulation and trade agreements and with a great measure of success. There are, however, certain economic necessities which must dominate war regulation of industry and which, in themselves, can not entirely eliminate profiteering and which, in my view, can only be accomplished if reenforced by taxation on war profits.

In the face of shortage—and we are short of most commodities to-day—the maximum production of that commodity is positively essential. In Government regulation, to safeguard production, all profits or prices must be based either directly through price or indirectly through profits on the stimulation of production. The consequence is that it is necessary to set these standards sufficiently high to maintain and stimulate a certain level of high-cost producers. There is, however, a point in profits or price where the increase in production is not commensurate and restraint is needed lest price ascend to a height where the people of the more limited means can no longer buy. This is conservation for the rich and not for the poor. On the other hand, neither the cost nor the profits in any two units of production will be the same, and while the high-cost producers may be limited to low margins the low-cost producers under these conditions will make profiteering profits. While I am convinced that regulation of the types in practice by many executive departments are fundamentally essential to prevent runaway markets and vicious speculation, I can see no remedy for the intermediate situations below such regulations, except a graduated excess-profits tax that will restore that excess of profits made from public necessity back to the public. It is my belief from an intimate contact with many industries that such a course of enlarged taxation will be patriotically supported by them. A good case in point is sugar. If sugar were unrestrained by agreements, the price would, in the face of this world shortage, go to 20 cents per pound, as it has in countries where no restraint exists. As the American people consume 8,000,000,000 pounds, such a rise in price would cost the consumers $800,000,000. The great majority of producers, manufacturers, and the public agree that restraint is essential. In considering the costs of production we find that a certain level is necessary to protect the high-cost producers. Yet at this level a minority of the beet factories will be earning profits of from 40 per cent to 100 per cent upon their investment. This minority creates the impression of profiteering. Their profits are inordinate. While the public can receive its major protection through the measures taken, the correction of this minority profiteering can only be remedied by stronger taxation of war profits.

There is an additional phase of the limitation of profits by regulation where such regulation needs coordination with taxation. If a regulation of profits or price is placed at so low a level as to restrain the profits of the low-cost producer to a normal profit, it will not only cut off high-cost producers and increase the shortage, but sometimes gives to the low-cost producer the entire field and means the crowding out of many business concerns. In many industries it means bigger businesses will survive and the smaller businesses will be extinguished. This is typically the case in the meat-packing industry. The five large concerns together kill about 40 per cent of the animals of the country. They will this year produce about 7,000,000,000 pounds of meat products. They are so regulated as to profits on animal business (in fact, on all business except foreign holdings and nonfood business) that their earnings could not exceed 1 cent per pound of meat products produced. Yet if they earned this amount they would earn $70,000,000 per annum. I am sure the packers themselves will agree upon their prewar experience that this would be an inordinate profit. On the other hand, a further drastic lowering of profits would, in some branches of the business covered by the packers, drive struggling competition from the field.

There is one feature in all regulation of profits—in food trades particularly—that is sometimes overlooked. These trades are nearly all seasonal, and they are in the vast majority dealing with perishable products. By taking a few months during the season of prime operations, their profits may appear large, but they must face largely reduced profits or even losses over the balance of the year. This is particularly true in the grain and vegetable handling and in cereal-milling trades. Regulated margins, while placed at levels preventive of extortion, must still be high enough to cover risks and inequalities in earnings, and the excess profits of the more fortunate operators can only be further equalized by strong taxation of war profits.

There is still another feature of this work that needs emphasis. In the administration of regulatory measures or the formulation of trade agreements affecting profits and prices to the public and to the Government, all officials are under great pressure to keep margins at a very low ebb. The tendency is to be too narrow in such negotiations and to endanger production. Furthermore, in an effort to prevent profiteering and secure the best terms these arrangements are elaborated to cover all sorts of conditions, and the economic reactions from this paternalism are often bad. If there were a strong excess-profits tax on war profits, all these measures could be formulated with a broader hand and a real reduction of Government interference.

As to the food trades generally, I am convinced that the unreasonable profits, since regulations as to reasonable margins on various commodity operations were established, have greatly diminished. A scientifically worked-out index shows in the margin between the prices received by the producer and those received by wholesalers for the prepared foods a reduction of approximately 30 per cent during the past year.

It is always possible that either certain favorably situated and managed concerns will make undue profits or that unpatriotic men will violate regulations or agreements. The latter can, and will, be reached in the food trades when a sufficient period to permit of action based on just procedure has been covered. The abnormal profits out of war conditions of the favorably situated producer can only be reached by taxation, unless, by regulation, we take the risk of curtailing production and the demoralization of the economic conditions of the country. Furthermore, if such increased taxation were imposed, it would enable regulation to be carried out with a more liberal hand and less friction.

In summary, my view is that broad regulatory restraints now in force are essential in commodity handling in the face of shortages. I am equally convinced that a large percentage of extra normal profits earned out of war conditions, whether by more fortunately situated members of regulated trades or otherwise, should be appropriated to the Public Treasury through taxation.

Yours, faithfully,

HERBERT HOOVER.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

REPLY OF AMERICAN METAL CO.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, in the report of the Federal Trade Commission published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the other day an implication of irregularity has been given widespread publicity in so far as the report affects the American Metal Co. Because of that fact a reply from the company has been prepared, and I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the RECORD. It will take about a third of a column of the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULY 5, 1918.

The honorable the FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C.

SIRS: We have refrained from commenting upon the published summaries of the report of your commission of June 28 until we could secure and examine an official copy. We note from a careful reading thereof that it contains no charge or allegation such as was implied in some of the newspapers, that the payment of tantiemes, or profit-sharing allotments, to the officers and managers of our company was made for the purpose of evading taxation, although that was the natural inference to be drawn from the facts stated.

In order to correct certain misapprehensions existing in your commission, as well as to rectify as far as possible the injury which has been done to our company and its officers before the public, we beg to lay before you the following facts:

I. The tantieme, or profit-sharing, system was not recently devised, but has been in vogue in the American Metal Co. since its incorporation, more than 30 years ago. In 1887, when our company was incorporated, its organizers, who furnished the necessary capital, made an agreement with the managers whereby the net earnings of the company in excess of 6 per cent on its capital stock should be divided between stockholders and managers in a given proportion in lieu of the customary salaries. This system was, therefore, started long before the days of income or excess-profits taxes, and has been continued to this day, and adequate provisions covering it are contained in the company's charter. The profit-sharing practice is not at all unusual in large companies, although this particular form may be to a certain extent unique. Promoters and organizers of large enterprises usually receive the fruits of years of labor through stock acquisition and earnings thereon by means of capitalizing surplus, good will, etc. By our method there is a continuing inducement to extra and intelligent endeavor in the management of the company's affairs, for the reason that succession in office and a share in the profits depend not on shareholdings but solely on services rendered.

The Government also fares better, because the progressive features of the income and excess-profits tax laws impose heavier rates of taxation upon the individuals than would have been imposed upon the corporation had the total salaries and commissions paid to them been taxed to the corporation on the excess-profits tax basis. These facts are apparent from the tax returns of our corporation, its subsidiaries, and its individual officers, which were months ago filed with the Treasury Department.

II. The tantiemes paid to our officers are not included in the items going to make up our production costs. It seems extraordinary to us that the personal affairs of our officers and managers, which would normally be considered a matter entirely between them and the stockholders, should have been made public by your commission. It is apparent, however, from the text of your report that this action was taken on the theory that these salaries and commissions, having been charged to expense account, entered into the cost of production of the metals produced by our company and required by the Government in the prosecution of the war. We wish to state that this theory is entirely incorrect. At the time your investigators examined our accounts, we gave them our complete cost records and pointed out to them that our subsidiary companies were largely managed and operated by the officers and department heads of the parent company; that these men receive no compensation from the subsidiary companies, and that no charge is included in the cost accounts of our subsidiaries for salaries or overhead central-office management. We can not emphasize too strongly, therefore, that the individual earnings of our officers and directors are not charged to production costs, but are figured on the profits of the company's entire commercial, financial, and industrial business, not only in this country but also in the allied and neutral world. In the year 1917 our total business amounted to upward of $150,000,000, of which our zinc industry, contrary to inference, constituted only about one-third. It is therefore apparent that the company's profits are very moderate, considering the volume of its transactions, and that the inference of profiteering drawn by certain newspapers is entirely unjustified.

We are transmitting copies of this letter to the press for the purpose of correcting, as far as possible, the public misunderstanding which has arisen with reference to our company and its officers through the published summaries of your report.

Respectfully,

THE AMERICAN METAL CO. (LTD.),
By C. M. LOEB, President.

CONTROL OF TELEGRAPH LINES.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to present to the Senate certain telegrams which I have received and I ask that they be printed in the RECORD. I want to read one of them, and the rest of them I shall not ask to have printed in full. The one I desire to read is as follows:

KANSAS CITY, MO., July 9, 1918.

Hon. JAMES A. REED,
Washington, D. C.:

Three thousand employees Western Union Telegraph Co., Kansas City and vicinity, pledge, through me as their representative to convention Chicago, July 10, for purpose of organization, their loyalty to Government and company. They are not in any manner in sympathy with organization known as Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America or its method; that they will not join in any strike called for or by that organization, but will always give their best services for their Government and their employers. We beg you use your influence to perpetuate the great rapidity present organization is handling Government traffic. You must agree this is no time to experiment.

Signed by H. M. Schwarz and a large number of telegraphers.

There is another telegram of the same date.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri state whether they are on the same subject?

Mr. REED. Yes; but it is a little different kind of a telegram. Its reading will take only a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. REED. The telegram is as follows:

Outside influences are trying to inject discord among the loyal employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. We are loyal to the Government first and the Western Union next, and outside interference will (if not stopped at once) do harm to all. Therefore we beg that the Senate take their vacation without any action toward Government control of telegraph and telephone systems, and when the Senate reassembles they will find the telegraph system working first for the Government business, then for the public.

Verification and original signatures by mail.

WESTERN UNION EMPLOYEES.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator from Missouri now simply announce the number of the telegrams, and state that they run along the same line, and present them without having them printed in the RECORD?

Mr. REED. I have a telegram from the employees of the Western Union Telegraph office at St. Louis, in which they protest that they are not parties to any strike agitation now being conducted against the Western Union; that they are loyal Americans, and, as such, appreciate that the present time is no time for disloyal acts. They had previously advised President Wilson that they would stick to their posts, and intended to do so. This telegram is signed by T. Sennewald and about 200 other employees.

I have a similar telegram from St. Louis, in which the statement is made that the undersigned repudiate the statements appearing in the public press, to the effect that they are parties to the strike agitation, and they protest that they will stick by their posts and will stand by the Government and the President. This telegram is certainly signed by 250 or more telegraph operators.

Mr. President, on another subject I desire to call attention to this telegram——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, before the Senator leaves that subject I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. REED. Very well. I will yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri if he is aware of the fact that the union which called the strike has not a single member on the Western Union line? It only has a little over 2,000 members in Canada and the United States, while there are 75,000 commercial telegraphers.

Mr. REED. I did not know that; but the telegrams I have presented are from employees who protest that that union, whatever it is, does not represent them. If it is true, as the Senator from Minnesota evidently thinks it is—of course if he asserts it as a fact, I take his word, but I understand he makes his statement on information—that the so-called strike which has been called, or was originally called, by some organization does not have a single employee on the Western Union, and I presume he would include in that the Postal Telegraph Co.——

Mr. KELLOGG. I presume that is true of the Postal Telegraph Co.

Mr. REED. Then, it seems to me, that this effort to alarm the country because of a pretended strike ought to be a lesson to us from which we should draw the conclusion that we had better understand what we are doing before we act.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri if he will allow me to include with the telegrams he has presented on that subject one which has been sent to me, and to have it printed in the RECORD?

Mr. REED. Certainly, so far as I am concerned it may go in at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., July 9, 1918.

Hon. F. B. KELLOGG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., in this city, numbering nearly 1,000, are loyal to their country and employer, and, as far as the secrecy of Government traffic is concerned, all employees stand as one behind the Government in this world crisis. There seems to be considerable agitation for Government control of telegraph lines, which is being given wide publicity in the country's newspapers. We feel that this agitation and publicity is unwarranted. We hope you will not support this move.

MINNEAPOLIS WESTERN UNION EMPLOYEES.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that those who threatened to strike number less than 2,500, about 1,200 of whom, as I understand, live in the United States, and are principally employed on private wires for boards of trade, exchanges, and organizations of that sort, and for individuals. Not one of them, according to my information, is connected with the Western Union Co. or the Postal Telegraph Co. There is not any threat, and there has been no threat, of a strike on the part of a single employee of the Western Union Telegraph Co. in the United States.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I took occasion to say the other day, merely from my general acquaintance with the telegraphers with whom I have the good fortune to be acquainted, that I believed that, as a class, they were as loyal as were any other class of our citizens; that I did not believe loyal men would strike and tie up the telegraph lines of the United States at this juncture; and that I believed that the people of the United States were not divided into special classes. My idea is that it is as ridiculous to say that the telegraph operators are willing to tie up the business of the country, as it would be to say that the farmers of the country are willing to tie up the business of the country, or that the bankers are willing to tie up the business of the country, or that the newspaper men are willing to do so. There may be some men in each of those vocations in life who are selfish and who would be willing to do anything for their own benefit; but I am thankful that pretty nearly all of the American people are loyal. I do not believe there has been any danger of a strike, and I am glad to have this cumulative evidence to that effect.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the threatened strike, as I understand, by this Commercial Telegraphers' Union—I think that is the name of it—was because the Western Union Telegraph Co. would not employ members of that organization. None of the Western Union employees belong to the organization, and this threatened strike was to bring into the Western Union employment those employees. That was the grievance.

PRICE OF WHEAT.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, upon another subject, and while I have the floor, I desire to read the telegram which I hold in my hand. I will say to the Senate that it comes from the secretary of agriculture of the State of Missouri. I call attention to it because I think it ought to have an important bearing upon the question of the price fixing on wheat. It is dated July 9, from Jefferson City, Mo., and is as follows:

Guaranteeing 1919 wheat at about $2.50 on basis of No. 2 before adjournment is essential to sustain and increase 1919 acreage. Plowing begins here next week.

JEWELL MAYS.

This is fall plowing for winter wheat.

The Senate by an enormous majority wrote $2.50 wheat into the Agricultural appropriation bill before the spring sowing of the past spring, intending to encourage the sowing of spring wheat. The committee of the House of Representatives held that bill until all the spring sowing was over and until the harvest was almost over, and I think did it for the purpose of being able to claim that there was no occasion to increase the price, because it could not encourage sowing after the sowing season had passed. They forgot two things. One was that many farmers of the United States undoubtedly believed that the House of Representatives would be permitted at least to vote upon a measure that had received a decisive vote in the Senate and that they would receive the benefits of the guaranty; and I think that any House of Congress or any committee of a House of Congress under such circumstances ought to have passed the bill, because it undoubtedly had been relied upon. Instead of that, they seemed to act on the theory that if a farmer planted his wheat and did not have a bond actually signed it was a good time to defraud him. It is a practice that I would not like to comment on, because if I did I would trespass upon parliamentary regulations.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I have not completed my statement. The next thing they overlooked was that the wheat seasons almost run together. They had no sooner laid down the proposition that there was no use to pass that bill, because the spring-wheat crop had already been sown, until they ran into the fall-wheat sowing. This telegram from the secretary of agriculture of the State of Missouri calls attention to the fact that if we are to encourage the planting of a large crop of wheat for next year we must do it at once, because the plowing for winter wheat will begin in the State of Missouri in two weeks, and that means that the plowing has already begun in States farther South.

I now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Missouri, in that connection, if his attention has been called to the fact that on the 2d day of this month an increase in the price of copper was made by the War Industries Board amounting to 2½ cents a pound? The price previous to that was 23½ cents. The price now is 26 cents a pound. That is an increase of a little more than 10 per cent. The price fixed upon wheat in the bill, which is now in the hands of the President, is a little less than 10 per cent at Chicago, a little more than 10 per cent in some of the western interior markets, and considerably less than 10 per cent in some of the eastern markets; but a price has been granted upon copper—and I do not animadvert upon that; if the increase was based upon a proved necessity I do not complain—and I have in my hand the order issued on the 2d day of this month granting an increase of the price of copper to the extent of 2½ cents a pound. I say I do not complain of that; but it is a larger increase on copper than the increase proposed in the bill now in the President's hands upon wheat at a number of the interior markets; in other words, the price on copper has been advanced more than the bill seeks to increase it upon wheat in many instances.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, that is not the only increase, for, if I understand—and I am simply taking the statement of the press—the price of steel has recently been very generously increased. The wages of the country have been increased, and the price of steel and the price of copper have both, I think, been increased by the War Industries Board.

Mr. GORE. Copper, I know, has been; I am not advised as to steel.

Mr. REED. But the Senator overlooks one important fact, namely, that the steel industry and the copper industry are both in the hands of very capable organizations that have their representatives in Washington, and they have the right to have them in Washington. They are, therefore, able to present their case; but who is there here to represent the farmers of the United States?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on that point, of course, I am aware that Mr. Baruch is at the head of the War Industries Board; and my information is that it is a price-fixing committee of that board which granted the increase in the price of copper. To what extent Mr. Baruch is interested in copper I do not know. I think he was formerly interested in copper. I have a statement here on my desk upon the subject, which I have not had an opportunity to examine as yet.

EXPULSION OF ANARCHISTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, morning business is closed.

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 489, which is the anarchist bill, and which has been up for consideration on one or two previous occasions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 12402) to exclude and expel from the United States aliens who are members of the anarchistic and similar classes.

Mr. GORE. I think the bill has been read in extenso.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that, so far as it is known at the desk, the bill has not yet been read in full. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That aliens who are anarchists; aliens who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law; aliens who disbelieve in or are opposed to all organized government; aliens who advocate or teach the assassination of public officials; aliens who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property; aliens who are members of or affiliated with any organization that entertains a belief in, teaches, or advocates the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States or of all forms of law, or that entertains or teaches disbelief in or opposition to all organized government, or that advocates the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, or that advocates or teaches the unlawful destruction of property shall be excluded from admission into the United States.

SEC. 2. That any alien who, at any time after entering the United States, is found to have been at the time of entry, or to have become thereafter, a member of any one of the classes of aliens enumerated in section one of this act, shall, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, be taken into custody and deported in the manner provided in the immigration act of February 5, 1917. The provisions of this section shall be applicable to the classes of aliens mentioned in this act irrespective of the time of their entry into the United States.

SEC. 3. That any alien who shall, after he has been excluded and deported or arrested and deported in pursuance of the provisions of this act, thereafter return to or enter the United States or attempt to return to or to enter the United States shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than five years; and shall, upon the termination of such imprisonment, be taken into custody, upon the warrant of the Secretary of Labor, and deported in the manner provided in the immigration act of February 5, 1917.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator having charge of the bill a question. On line 10, page 3, section 2, it says:

That any alien who, at any time after entering the United States, is found to have been at the time of entry or to have become thereafter, a member of any one of the classes of aliens enumerated—

Who is to make that discovery or finding?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is made in the same way that the discovery is now made with respect to those who were anarchists when they came here, and where the discovery was made within five years. I will say to the Senator that it does not change the principles of the present law in that regard, excepting in this particular instance: As I understand the existing law, the person must have been an anarchist when he came here. Under the pending bill if he became an anarchist or if the fact developed that he was an anarchist after his coming into the United States, that would subject him to deportation in exactly the same way that he is now subject to deportation if he was an anarchist before he came and if the fact is discovered within five years.

I should say to the Senator that the five-year limitation is removed, and I think that is the principal object of the bill. It is contended by the Department of Labor that there are a good many anarchists here, particularly in the far-western States, and it is claimed that they are coached when they come here not to reveal the fact that they are anarchists within a period of five years. After the expiration of the five years it is alleged that they become extremely active, because they enjoy perfect immunity. The object is to take away that immunity and to subject them after five years to exactly the same liability to deportation as if the fact were discovered before five years.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, do I understand, then, that the trial of the alleged anarchists is to be held before the immigration officials?

Mr. GORE. The party is apprehended upon a writ issued by the Secretary of Labor. I will say to the Senator that that is the law now in all cases of deportation. That has been the practice since the passage of the immigration law a quarter of a century or more ago. There is no change in that particular.

Mr. PENROSE. Then, Mr. President, all the bill does in that respect is to remove the limitation of five years, apparently.

Mr. GORE. It does this, further, that if the alien becomes an anarchist after he comes into the country it subjects him to deportation as well as if he were an anarchist when he came.

Mr. PENROSE. One further question, and I am through. I do not intend to obstruct the bill, although I think it rather vaguely drawn in many particulars. How are some of these aliens to be deported; for instance, an alien anarchist from Germany? How is he to be sent back to Germany?

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that I am not able to answer his question in detail, but I assume that the law as it is now administered with respect to cases subject to deportation will be likewise administered in regard to these particular cases. Of course, an anarchist coming from Germany, if he is an alien, is an alien enemy, and that question would not really arise, because he could be interned.

Mr. PENROSE. He could not very well be sent back to Germany without very great peril to the escorting party.

Mr. GORE. That is true. The escorting party would perhaps decline the courtesy.

Mr. PENROSE. Most people would decline the position.

Mr. GORE. Probably we would not be harassed with applicants for that particular office.

Mr. PENROSE. And he could not very well be sent back to Russia or to Austria.

Mr. GORE. I do not know that there would be any difficulty in sending him back to Russia, providing he were willing to go.

Mr. PENROSE. It is quite a long journey.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PENROSE. As I say, Mr. President, while the bill seems to be loosely drawn, so many similar measures are being passed by the Senate that I shall not object.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that one of the objects of the bill is to correct an apparent and perhaps a real looseness in the existing law, and I will call the Senator's attention to this fact: There is no change in the classes enumerated. There is no change in the classes to be subjected to deportation, excepting those who have been here over five years and those who become anarchists after their entry into the country.

The existing law begins:

Anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate—

the various doctrines enumerated. Now, the pending bill enumerates exactly the same classes as the existing law, with the addition of the class of those who become anarchists after their arrival; but the pending bill says "Anarchists, or aliens who" instead of "or persons who." It is insisted by some—I think the representatives of some of these aliens—that the word "persons" is simply definitive of the word "anarchists," and that the various classes enumerated do not constitute separate categories, and that proof must be made in each instance that the alien is an anarchist and that he openly advocates the destruction of government, and so forth. It is to make it more explicit in that regard that the word "aliens" is used instead of "persons," so as to indicate that it is an enumeration of separate and distinct classes.

That is the principal object of the bill. There is no revolution, I may say, in the existing immigration law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator if there is not a change of the law in this respect——

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that there are three or four changes.

Mr. REED. The law as it now stands, at least as I have always understood it to be—I have not had an opportunity to examine it recently—excludes from its terms political refugees.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that there is no change in that respect.

Mr. REED. I am afraid there is a change, because the language of the bill as it is now presented——

Mr. GORE. If the Senator will listen to the reading of the enumerations in the existing law and in the pending bill, I think he will see that there is no change made with respect to political offenders.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the old law, being "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States," passed February 5, 1917, contains this language:

That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States.

Then it proceeds to enumerate the classes, among them being idiots, imbeciles, and a large number of others. Coming down to the class under consideration, the language is as follows:

Anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of the United States, or of all forms of law, or who disbelieve in or are opposed to organized government, or who advocate the assassination of public officials, or who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property; persons who are members of or affiliated with any organization entertaining and teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government, or who advocate or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety of the unlawful assaulting or killing of any officer or officers, either of specific individuals or of officers generally, of the Government of the United States or of any other organized government, because of his or their official character, or who advocate or teach the unlawful destruction of property.

Mr. REED. Is there not in the bill an exception of political offenses?

Mr. GORE. The pending bill?

Mr. REED. No; in the old law?

Mr. GORE. No, sir; that is the enumeration, and then follows——

Mr. REED. I think there is an exception in the old law.

Mr. GORE. If there is, it would stand, because the pending bill does not affect it.

Mr. REED. I think it would, unless——

Mr. GORE. Oh, no; it recites the same enumeration, with the addition of the class of those who become anarchists after they come in. As I recollect, that is the only change.

Mr. REED. But the point is this: The old law named these particular individuals, just as the present bill does; and then the old law added a proviso that political offenders should not be included. That would, of course, except them from the old law.

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. REED. Now, if we pass this bill without making the same exception it would be the controlling statute, because it would be the latest.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator does not mean, does he, that political offenders who are aliens and who are anarchists ought to have some immunity or be excluded from the operation of this bill?

Mr. REED. Oh, no. This is what I have in mind——

Mr. GORE. I see the Senator's point.

Mr. REED. I have in mind men like Kossuth; these men who were revolutionists in their own country and who therefore taught unlawful resistance to the constituted authorities of their country, and who taught the destruction of property, not as anarchists but as revolutionists. These men who have heretofore been admitted to this country because they are the disciples of liberty, would come within this bill as it is now drawn, or might come within it.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator is in error, because it does not relate to that at all.

Mr. REED. I think it does.

Mr. GORE. It simply enumerates the same classes; and any exception in the law that is not affected by the pending bill would, of course, stand.

Mr. REED. No; not at all, this being the later bill.

Mr. GORE. If they were in conflict that might be, but there would be no conflict, because it enumerates the same classes, and it does not say "all forms of government," but "all forms of law."

Mr. REED. I can not agree with the Senator; and this is what I have to suggest: I want to see the necessary laws passed to get rid of every anarchist in our country. We have been too long a refuge of anarchists. If I understand the facts, there are a lot of scoundrels who loafed around in the United States and agitated here, and then went over and helped to produce this revolution in Russia. The sooner we get rid of that kind of people the better; but, on the other hand, I do not want some Secretary of Labor, now or in the future, to seize some man who may have undertaken to overthrow a tyrannical government and send him back to execution. Our country never has done that, and I think this bill ought to be carefully scanned to see that it does not do that; and I think we can lay it over for one day, particularly in view of the fact that we have this very important Agricultural bill ready for consideration.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, in view of the Senator's statement, and in order to afford him an opportunity to compare the pending bill with existing law, which I think will obviate his objection, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before the Senator from Oklahoma makes that motion I want to inquire concerning House bill 12402. That bill, I observe, authorizes the deportation of one who becomes an anarchist in this country, without respect to time.

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir. I may say to the Senator that that is the material difference between the pending bill and the existing law.

Mr. WALSH. So that one may come to this country not tinctured with that sort of idea at all, become a citizen of this country——

Mr. GORE. No; not a citizen. This relates only to aliens.

Mr. WALSH. An alien living in this country for any length of time, and then becoming an anarchist by reason of conditions in this country which meet his disapproval, may then be sent back to the country from which he came?

Mr. GORE. The Senator's interpretation of the bill is exactly correct.

Mr. WALSH. I want to inquire of the Senator, then, whether there are any statutes or treaties with foreign countries against which we would offend by that course of conduct?

Mr. GORE. I may say to the Senator that I assume not, because this Government now exercises the right of deportation in many cases up to a residence of five years, and in respect to the white-slave traffic the limitation is entirely removed. It is intended to place anarchists of this sort in the same category in that regard as the white-slave traffic. There is no limitation as to the time. But the Senator has put his finger on the exact point. When a person becomes an anarchist after coming into this country the bill subjects him to deportation; and I may say to the Senator that it is contended by the department that anarchists come in here and conceal their anarchistic views for the period of five years, and are coached by their fellows, and after the expiration of the five years they then enjoy immunity under the law. A number of aliens of that description are now giving considerable annoyance to the department and stirring up considerable agitation in the country, and I may say frankly that it is in order to get rid of those anarchist aliens that this legislation is brought in.

Mr. WALSH. I asked the Senator because I had in mind the fact that it is said that there is no small number of people who come into this country and return to Russia, or even of our own people who go to Russia, and there imbibe anarchistic sentiments; and I was wondering what attitude our Government would take if the Government of Russia should undertake to unload those people upon us.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I suppose it would be a sort of obnoxious reciprocity to which we would be obliged to submit.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. GORE. I do; but I will say to the Senator that I have requested that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate, with a view to laying this bill aside for the present.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, before the bill is laid aside I should like to ask the Senator whether it is intended to send a man out of the country simply because he holds a belief?

Mr. GORE. A certain description of belief; yes, sir.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Regardless of whether he advocates it or teaches it?

Mr. GORE. I think that is true now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How are you going to find out whether or not he holds the belief?

Mr. GORE. Of course, there would be no way to find out unless he gave evidence of it either by spoken word or by act.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then should not this language be changed? In line 3 it is stated:

Aliens who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence—

Should not that be "aliens who believe in and advocate the overthrow"? You certainly do not propose to set up some tribunal to inquire into a man's belief.

Mr. GORE. I feel the force of the Senator's objection, but I will say that the pending bill simply reiterates existing law in that regard.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I certainly think the word "or" ought to be changed to "and," because we do not want to undertake in any tribunal to test a man's belief.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I renew my request that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Oklahoma moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the pending amendment of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 22, the committee proposes to change the total appearing in that line by striking out "$2,136,028" and in lieu inserting "$1,610,155."

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the amendment may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule of procedure the amendment will be passed over. The Secretary will report the next amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 15, after the words "preparation of sweet sirups" insert a comma and the words "including grape sirup."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the agreement the amendment will go over.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is, on page 9, lines 20 and 21, where the committee proposes to strike out "control of noxious rodents, $100,000," and the semicolon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that that may go over.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to ask the chairman why the appropriation of $100,000 for noxious rodents was stricken from the bill.

Mr. GORE. It was due to the anticipated eloquence of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not intend to oppose the amendment, but I was curious to know why it had been stricken out. If it had been merely rodents, it might have been stricken out; but to strike out a noxious rodent struck me rather unfavorably.

Mr. GORE. People's tastes, of course, change, and probably we are more fastidious in classing them as noxious rodents. But the Senator from Washington objects, and I ask that the amendment may go over.

Mr. PENROSE. Can the Senator tell me just what variety of rodents are described as noxious?

Mr. GORE. I may say to the Senator, as he seems to have a very statesmanlike curiosity on this subject, the explanation by the department made it manifest, I think, that they intended to make an assault on rats and mice in dwellings. We thought perhaps that was going a little too far in these strenuous times, and we would leave the individual and our great individualistic theory to combat the mice, at least for a time.

Mr. PENROSE. They are to have temporary immunity.

Mr. GORE. Since we are to have woman suffrage it was thought the women ought to combat the mice. At least that was the argument that was made before the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. PENROSE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I was going to suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that there are perhaps two sorts of rodents, noxious and obnoxious, and inasmuch as this amendment was drawn so as to enable the department to do away with the noxious rodents it is quite obvious that the obnoxious rodents are not at this session to be included in the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. GORE. We were afraid this item might prove obnoxious to certain Senators and therefore struck it out.

Mr. PENROSE. I regret to see the food supply in this war crisis imperiled by the elimination of an item of this kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the objection of the Senator from Washington the amendment will be passed over and the next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment of the committee is, on page 9, line 22, in the total. The committee proposes to strike out "$1,105,980" and to insert in lieu "$1,005,980."

Mr. SMOOT. That had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under objection, it goes over.

The SECRETARY. Beginning with the word "Provided," in line 23, page 9, the committee proposes to strike out all of the bill down to and including line 17, on page 10.

Mr. REED. Let that go over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will go over, and the next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10 the committee proposes to insert a new section as section 2.

Mr. REED. Let that go over. Let all the remaining amendments go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the remaining amendments go over. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I have an amendment pending on page 3, I think it is.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement I take it that the Secretary will now report the amendments that have been passed over, beginning with the first.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There has been no agreement to that effect. The only agreement the Chair recalls was that unobjected amendments should be first disposed of.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, why not dispose of the point of order raised by me yesterday concerning the last amendment to the bill and get it out of the way, one way or the other, and then discuss the general provisions of the bill and the amendments objected to?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would be a perfectly proper course.

Mr. REED. I withdraw my objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania calls up the amendment, which will be read.

Mr. PENROSE. I raise a point of order on the amendment that it is general legislation on an appropriation bill.

Mr. GORE. Did the Senator reserve the point of order?

Mr. PENROSE. I did. I entered the point of order and now bring it up so that we may dispose of it one way or the other. I made the point of order, I may say, not only on this, but on the committee substitute which was printed as a separate sheet, and which, as I understand it, is technically in the bill as reported from the committee. I call it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection on the part of the Senate to considering the amendment which has been called up at this time? The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The amendment is called up for consideration?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. It will be read:

The SECRETARY. On page 6, beginning with line 11, the committee proposes to strike out down to and including line 20, and to insert the following:

That after June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war, for the purpose of conserving the man power of the Nation and to increase the efficiency in the production of arms, war munitions, food, and clothing for the Army and Navy, it shall be unlawful to sell for beverage purposes, except for export, any distilled spirits, and no distilled spirits held in bond after June 30, 1919, shall be removed therefrom for beverage purposes except for export. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is hereby authorized and directed to prescribe rules and regulations, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the removal of distilled spirits held in bond after June 30, 1919, for other than beverage purposes or for export. After three months from the approval of this act until the conclusion of the present war no grain, cereal, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer or other intoxicating malt liquors, and after the approval of this act no beer or other intoxicating malt liquors shall be imported into the United States for beverage purposes. After June 30, 1919, until the conclusion of the present war, no foods or fruits shall be used in the manufacture or production of vinous intoxicating liquors except for export. Any person who violates any of the foregoing provisions or any of said rules and regulations made to carry the same into effect shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest the absence of a quorum, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Smoot
Beckham	Kellogg	Pittman	Sterling
Benet	Kendrick	Poindexter	Sutherland
Borah	Kenyon	Pomerene	Swanson
Brandegee	King	Ransdell	Thomas
Calder	Lenroot	Reed	Thompson
Curtis	Lewis	Saulsbury	Trammell
France	McKellar	Shafroth	Underwood
Frelinghuysen	Martin	Sheppard	Vardaman
Gerry	Myers	Sherman	Wadsworth
Gore	Nelson	Shields	Walsh
Hale	New	Simmons	Warren
Harding	Norris	Smith, Ariz.	Watson
Henderson	Nugent	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Smith, Md.

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is detained on official business.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to state that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. FLETCHER] is temporarily absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania made a point of order against this amendment on the ground that it is general legislation proposed to a general appropriation bill. I should like to discuss that for just a few moments, if the Chair will permit me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will be very glad to hear the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think there is more involved in this question than an ordinary point of order. In the first place, the Chair is called upon to decide whether this is a general appropriation bill or not. It is not a bill mentioned by the rules or anywhere brought within my judgment in the scope of that term. So, with all due respect to the Chair, I suggest that that proposition ought to be decided by the Senate; that the Senate itself should determine what is or what is not a general appropriation bill. The Senate having determined what is a general appropriation bill, then it is, I think, very proper to leave the matter to the Chair as to whether a proposal to amend such a bill is in order under the rules of the Senate. I wish to make that suggestion to the Chair at the outset with the greatest respect. I have great confidence in the judgment of the Chair, but a fundamental matter like this should be settled by the Senate itself.

Mr. President, this bill does not even purport by its title to be an appropriation bill. The word appropriation is not mentioned in the title of the bill. The title of the bill is "An act to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.'"

Mr. President, anyone reading that title would have no information as to whether it carries any appropriation at all.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit an interruption——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I call his attention to the fact, however, that the act applies to the fiscal year and operates during the fiscal year. Certainly it is not the custom in special legislation to confine it to the fiscal year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The title of the act speaks very plainly. I have simply called attention to the proposition that the title of the act does not indicate that it is an appropriation bill at all. It simply says it is an act to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to do certain things and carry out certain acts. Then, with reference to the suggestion the Senator has just made, the act that it is intended to carry out is not permanent legislation at all. It is purely temporary.

Mr. PENROSE. For the fiscal year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; it may last the fiscal year and it may not. The act that this title proposes to carry out is an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products," and then section 12 of the act of August 10, 1917, provides—

That the provisions of this act shall cease to be in effect when the national emergency resulting from the existing state of war shall have passed, the date of which shall be ascertained and proclaimed by the President; but the date when this act shall cease to be in effect shall not be later than the beginning of the next fiscal year after the termination, as ascertained by the President, of the present war between the United States and Germany.

Mr. PHELAN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator read that the purpose of the present act was to further provide. Will he explain what that means? Does not the word "further" mean in furtherance of the general agricultural appropriation purposes?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The act speaks for itself.

Mr. PHELAN. I should like the Senator to tell me.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There are a great many different provisions in it.

Mr. PHELAN. What is the construction of the word "further" in that connection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think that is material at all.

Mr. PHELAN. It certainly relates to something.

Mr. JONES of Washington. What difference does that make?

Mr. PHELAN. It indicates that this bill becomes supplementary to the general Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not at all; it does not relate to the general appropriation bill.

Mr. PHELAN. That depends on the interpretation of the word "further."

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is not an appropriation act. This is what it proposes to carry into effect:

That, for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and carrying on the war with Germany by gathering authoritative information concerning the food supply, by increasing production, by preventing waste of the food supply, by regulating the distribution thereof, and by such other means and methods as are hereinafter provided, the powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are conferred and prescribed.

That is the purpose of the act as expressed in the first section. Of course a good deal of work has to be done and appropriations must be made, but they are temporary and for certain special purposes. Here is the work provided for that is also carried on under the general appropriation act. What did the chairman of the committee say yesterday with reference to this matter?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I hope the Senator will just wait a moment.

Mr. PENROSE. I will.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He said that this bill is being passed for a special purpose, that the appropriations are made for a special organization, and that this organization should be kept separate in the Agricultural Department, and that it will end with the war. That is true. This work he suggested would be carried on separately; and that is true, because it is of purely a temporary character. It ends when this emergency ends. Now I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. I only want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there is literally hardly a line in this bill which does not contain figures indicating the amount of an appropriation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator did not need to call my attention to that. I have read the bill over quite a number of times. I know that is true, but that does not make it a general appropriation act.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to my colleague, because he rose first.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Even if it was conceded that it was an appropriation act, I ask the Senator if, in order to bring it under the rule and make it obnoxious to the point of order, it would not have to be a general appropriation act?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. And, in further inquiry of the Senator, I would ask him if it is not a fact, which is obvious on the face of the bill—not only in the title but in all of its provisions—that it is a special appropriation bill to meet special conditions not provided for in the general appropriation act?

Mr. JONES of Washington. There can not be any doubt about that, Mr. President.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the question which was asked by the colleague of the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] covers the question that I was going to ask the Senator; but I was going to ask it in another way; and I might as well do it now. Does the Senator believe that, if this act had originated in the Senate, it would have been accepted in the other House and passed upon by the House as a special appropriation act; or, in other words, does the Senator hold that this bill ought to have originated in the other House, as all appropriation bills do? But it having originated there, of course, it was not originated as a general appropriation bill, but as a special appropriation bill? Is that the position which the Senator takes?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No. I do not care anything about the origination of the bill. There is quite a controversy as to whether or not appropriation bills must originate in the House of Representatives or in the Senate, and, as I understand, the Senate has always contended that appropriation bills may originate in the Senate. I have here Gilfry's Precedents on that very proposition.

Mr. PENROSE. But they are special bills.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not at all.

Mr. PENROSE. General appropriation bills can not originate here in the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish the Senator would listen to what I shall now read from page 59 of Gilfry's Precedents. I there find this:

> The House of Representatives has assumed to itself the exclusive power to originate appropriation bills, but a plain and literal interpretation of the first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution which says, "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills," gives the power to originate to the Senate, as well as to the House. This interpretation was clearly upheld in the Senate by reports from a conference committee of March 2, 1871, and from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, April 24, 1872, by Mr. Carpenter, who said, "The fact that the Constitution so carefully provides that 'bills for raising revenue' shall originate in the House of Representatives, and made no such provision in regard to bills appropriating money, is conclusive that it was intended to restrict the Senate in the one case and not in the other." Mr. Knott, on February 2, 1881, from the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives, elaborately discussed the power of the two Houses to originate appropriation bills; and the committee recommended the adoption of the following resolution relating to an appropriation bill passed by the Senate and referred to them "authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase additional lots of ground adjoining the new building for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing:
> Resolved, That the Senate had the constitutional power to originate the bill referred, and that the power to originate bills appropriating money from the Treasury of the United States is not exclusive in the House of Representatives. By recommendation of the committee, the bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

So there is a controversy between the two Houses with reference to that matter, which is not settled by the dictions of any Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, all those bills were special bills. I have myself on numerous occasions gotten through bills appropriating considerable amounts, which have originated in the Senate; but we would not undertake to get through the Senate a general appropriation bill for a fiscal year for a Government department, because the House of Representatives would not receive such a bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, Mr. President, what I have read does not refer to special appropriation bills at all, but refers to appropriation bills generally; and while the Senator from Pennsylvania on this occasion is very earnestly insisting, of course, that general appropriation bills must originate in the House of Representatives and not in the Senate, I venture to say that, under ordinary circumstances, he would contend for the rights of the Senate with reference to the origination of such bills if the proposition were presented. In my judgment this bill could originate in the Senate just the same as in the House.

Mr. President, the question of my colleague [Mr. POINDEXTER] covers the whole situation. This is not a general appropriation bill, and no one would think it to be a general appropriation bill on an examination of the terms or the title or the purpose of the bill. It is an act to carry out an act that was only temporary in character. It is only for a special purpose, not general, not permanent; but, as I have said, it is special, for a particular emergency and to last only for a particular time. So this bill is expressly temporary; it is expressly for a special purpose; it has not any of the characteristics of what we generally consider general appropriations or general appropriation bills.

Mr. President, I do not want to take very much of the time of the Senate; I am satisfied that Senators have their minds pretty well made up, and yet I wish to refer to an authority or two, which possibly Senators may not have examined. I have here the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume VIII, part 3, of the Forty-fifth Congress, third session, at page 1981. The Senate had under consideration a bill which by title purported to be an appropriation bill. I read as follows:

> The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 6462) making appropriations for the payment of the arrears of pensions granted by act of Congress approved January 25, 1879, and for other purposes.

That was an act to appropriate money to carry out another act, which applied generally throughout the country with reference to all persons who were entitled to arrears of pensions under that act. During the pendency of the bill, Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, proposed an amendment, which was clearly general legislation, and Senator Edmunds made a point of order against the amendment. He said:

> I make the point of order that it is legislation on a general appropriation bill.

Senators argued about it, and Mr. Ingalls suggested that the amendment had been reported by a standing committee. Mr. Edmunds said:

> That does not help it any. It is legislation, and I make the point of order that it is not germane, either. I insist upon all points in Rule XXIX, Mr. President.

Then the Chair made an examination, and this is what the Presiding Officer said:

> The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question of order of the Senator from Vermont embraces some five or six points, and the Chair is examining the rules and the bill before he gives his opinion. [A pause.] The Chair is of opinion that this is not a general appropriation bill. The term "general appropriation bill" derives its meaning from the usages of the two branches of Congress. In the House of Representatives the bills treated as general appropriation bills are specially mentioned and described in their rules and obliged by the rules to be reported within a particular time. The Chair is of opinion that the phrase "general appropriation bill," according to the rules of the Senate, applies to the regular annual appropriation bills, and to no others. The Chair will, if desired, submit the question whether the amendment is germane to the bill to the Senate.

I take it that you can not get a much clearer or a more definite precedent than that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to ask the Senator from Washington if that decision was rendered by the Vice President or by some Senator temporarily occupying the chair?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD merely says "the Presiding Officer." At the beginning of that day's session, on page 1980, the Vice President appears to have been in the chair. I have not examined it to ascertain whether or not there is any reference to a change of presiding officers. The debate goes right on to the next page, and so I assume that the Vice President was in the chair. However, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] suggests that if it reads "the Presiding Officer" the Vice President was not in the chair. On examining closer, I see that in the preceding column it says:

The Presiding Officer (Mr. Harris in the chair).

So Senator Harris was in the chair at the time. But I want to call attention to something further in connection with this same proposition. The amendment which had been proposed by Mr. Ingalls was discussed for some little time; other Senators came in; and the point was again raised, and I find that Mr. Thurman came in and suggested:

Mr. THURMAN. I understand the Chair to rule that this is not a general appropriation bill. I do not know where is the distinction between a general appropriation and a special or particular appropriation bill. It seems to me under our rules, but I say it with great submission, that upon any appropriation bill (and this is plainly an appropriation bill) it is competent to move to lay an amendment on the table.

Mr. INGALLS. I call the attention of the Chair to the last clause of Rule 29, which says:

"And any amendment to a general appropriation bill may be laid on the table without prejudice to the bill."

The irresistible inference from that would be that if the bill be not a general appropriation bill, laying the amendment on the table would also make the same disposition of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so stated.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator from Kansas please tell me what is a general appropriation bill?

Mr. INGALLS. A general appropriation bill, as I understand, is one acted on by the Committee on Appropriations under what is known as the long-established custom of the Government as a general appropriation bill.

This bill does not come within any definition of that character.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. MYERS. Was the ruling of the occupant of the chair, Mr. Harris, overruled by the Senate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will call the Senator's attention to what was done in just a moment. Mr. Ingalls continued:

I should call a special appropriation bill, a river and harbor bill, for instance, or a bill making appropriations to pay particular claims.

Mr. THURMAN. Now the Senator has hit the nail on the head. An individual appropriation bill is one thing; but when a bill comprises a whole mass of individuals like the pensioners of the United States, to call that a special appropriation bill strikes me as very singular.

Mr. INGALLS. The rule does not apply to that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has already ruled, when the Senator from Ohio was not in his seat, that the term "general appropriation bill," in the opinion of the Chair, includes the 12 annual appropriation bills which are reported year by year for the general expenses of the Government, and that it does not include bills like this which come up only on a special occasion and are not of annual recurrence and are not to carry on the general operations of the Government. The practice of the Senate, which has existed for some years, in regard to a somewhat similar bill to carry out the decisions of the Southern Claims Commission, is to the same effect. That bill is never treated as a general appropriation bill, but is referred to the Committee on Claims, and not to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. Edmunds said—and he used about the same argument that is presented with reference to this measure by those with whom I have talked privately:

Now, here is a bill to carry into effect and furnish the money to carry out a general law of Congress which has provided that the whole class of the people of the United States who fall within certain descriptions shall be entitled to certain sums of money, just as the legislative bill provides that a whole class of certain of the people of the United States who fall within certain descriptions—that is, those who hold office—shall be paid their salaries. I wish the Chair would submit—because I do not desire to appeal; it is too late for that—I wish the Chair would submit the question to the Senate whether this falls within the principle of a general appropriation bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will do so cheerfully. The Chair will submit to the Senate the question as requested by the Senator from Vermont. Is the pending bill a general appropriation bill within the meaning of Rule XXIX?

Then the vote was taken, the Presiding Officer putting the question as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is this a general appropriation bill within the meaning of the twenty-ninth rule? Those of that opinion will say "aye"; those of the contrary opinion will say "no" [putting the question].

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 13, noes 25; no quorum voting.

Mr. WITHERS. There are several Senators in the Chamber who have not voted either way. I ask that there be another division on the question to secure the expression of the opinion of a quorum of the body.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will again put the question.

The question being again put, there were on a division—ayes 14, noes 30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is overruled by the Senate.

So that, Mr. President, we have not only the ruling of the Presiding Officer, but we have the ruling of the Senate itself when the matter was submitted to the Senate as to whether or not a measure of this kind was a general appropriation bill, that it was not thus practically confirming the ruling and opinion expressed by the Chair.

I have not examined the terms of the bill then under discussion; but, according to the argument made by Senator Edmunds, it was substantially the same sort of a bill as we have now before us except that it had more of a permanent character than the pending measure. It was to carry out legislation of a general character that would remain upon the statute books until the whole object was carried out or the act repealed. This bill is simply to carry into effect, as I said a moment ago, the provisions of an act which by its terms is declared to be temporary and special.

As I said when I began, Mr. President, the substantial proposition here is, Is this a general appropriation bill? That is a proposition that ought to be determined by the Senate, with all due respect to the Chair. Of course, if it is determined to be a general appropriation bill, then the proposed legislation, I concede, as a general proposition and considered without regard to the action of the House, is subject to a point of order, even though it is temporary and expires with the bill.

I come now to another proposition, namely, that if it is a general appropriation bill, under the circumstances existing here this amendment is not subject to a point of order, for the reason that the House has already acted upon the proposition. It has not acted very definitely; it has not acted very certainly; but it has acted, and, under the ruling of the present Vice President, the House having opened the door, having opened the field, the Senate can explore it to the limit.

First, however, allow me to suggest this: While I know that in Congress not very much force is given to the title of a bill, and we may put almost any provision in a bill without regard to its title, I submit that it is proper to look at the title of the bill to determine its purpose, and that, in doing so, we can be guided as to our judgment or conclusion as to whether or not a proposal comes within that title. That has been followed by the President of this body. A few years ago there was an Indian appropriation bill pending before the Senate. An amendment was offered to which a point of order was made. The Vice President referred to the title of the bill to determine his action, and that seemed to influence him very largely in his conclusions. I have here the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-third Congress, first session, where, at page 2087, this ruling was made by the Vice President:

The Chair is of opinion that the citation of authorities from Bouvier's Law Dictionary is not of any value in construing the rules of the Senate. The definitions have to do with constitutional enactments with reference to general and special and public and private legislation. But from the statement made by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], accepting that to be the fact about the matter, that this is money which is to be distributed in accordance with treaty stipulations, and the title of the bill providing that it is for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, the Chair holds that it is not general legislation.

So the Chair referred to the title of the bill to assist him in reaching a conclusion as to whether or not the proposal was subject to a point of order.

Mr. President, the title of this bill is "To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out * * * the purposes of the act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products,'" and so forth. This amendment is clearly within the terms and provisions and purposes of the act which this bill is intended to carry out, because it is conducive to the national strength, the national security, and is for the conservation of food products, and so forth.

Now, Mr. President, I come to the point to which I wish to refer briefly, as to the effect of the action of the House. Even if we grant that this is a general appropriation bill—which I do not grant at all—then the action of the House authorizes the Senate under its rules to enact this legislation.

In the Sixty-fourth Congress, in the first session, at page 11087, I find this ruling by the Vice President. This was on the Post Office appropriation bill:

Notwithstanding the rule of the Senate to the effect that general legislation may not be attached to an appropriation bill, still when the House of Representatives opens the door and proceeds to enter upon a field of general legislation which has to do with a subject of this character, the Chair is going to rule, but of course the Senate can reverse the ruling of the Chair, that the House having opened the door the Senate of the United States can walk in through the door and pursue the field.

And the Chair overruled the point of order made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and this ruling stood as the ruling of the Senate.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, was not this bill considered by the House of Representatives to be a general appropriation bill, in that the committee submitted a limitation upon the appropriation in order to make it in order?

Mr. JONES of Washington. We are not controlled by the rules of the House. We are controlled by our own rules.

Mr. OVERMAN. No; but I am asking the Senator if he does not think the manner in which the amendment was put on that bill shows that they considered it necessary to put it in the form of a limitation in order to make it in order?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not know, and it does not make any difference what I think about it.

Mr. OVERMAN. In the House of Representatives, if it is a limitation upon the expenditure of money, it is in order. The Senator is a former Member of the House, and I am asking him as to the procedure in the House.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say that I do not think this would be subject to a point of order even in the House under the House rules, and that it would not be necessary for them to put on the limitation instead of putting on the legislation; but whether or not that question was raised in the House, I do not know. I have not examined the RECORD in that respect. I do not believe this is a general appropriation bill; and on that assumption, under the rule of the House, it would not be obnoxious to their rule, although I have not examined their recent rules. I am trying to have this question decided upon the rules of the Senate, where I think it should be decided.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that. The reason why I asked the question is because we want to decide whether or not this is a general appropriation bill. That is the first question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We can decide that question upon our own precedents.

Mr. OVERMAN. I understand that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is not mentioned anyway in the House; and the Presiding Officer, in the decision to which I have referred, says that the custom and practice of the House and the Senate lead him to conclude——

Mr. OVERMAN. I am not taking any issue with the Senator. I am trying to get information.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am giving the Senator all the information I have.

Mr. OVERMAN. The fact that that amendment was put on as a limitation upon the appropriation looks as though they considered it a general appropriation bill.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the question about which I wanted to ask the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well; I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. In that case—I did not pay any attention to which one it was—the case where the Senate decided that even though it was a general appropriation bill, and general legislation, the House having entered the field the Senate could pursue it, is it not true that the House entered the field by way of an amendment for a limitation, exactly as they did in this case?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am coming to that case now.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the case to which I have reference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is another case, where the Vice President made his first ruling that where the House opened the door of the field the Senate could walk through it.

Mr. NORRIS. The case I had in mind is the one the Senator is coming to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have that case right here. It covers the very proposition, I think.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, the point which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] was bringing out was that a limitation placed upon the appropriation carried in a general appropriation bill made the amendment in order, and had the Senate maintained that limitation in its amendment it would have still been in order; but that the Senate modified the House's point by removing the limitation, therefore not bringing it within the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator has not explored this matter.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. This amendment does not place any limitation upon any appropriation in this bill, but the House amendment did.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know; and I have a case here that is squarely in point and holds contrary to those who contend that this amendment is subject to the point of order, if I can understand precedents; and it is a precedent made by the Senate itself. I am glad to have the opportunity to call these matters to the attention of the Senate, because it seems to me that we have direct precedents to refute every claim that is made by those who contend that this amendment is subject to a point of order.

I have here a case arising in 1916. The Post Office appropriation bill came over here with a limitation upon a certain appropriation—just a pure limitation. That was clearly put on by the House in order to comply with its rules. There was no question but that the Post Office appropriation bill was a general appropriation bill; and I will say to the Senator from North Carolina that I have not examined the RECORD with reference to the discussion of this particular bill in the House to see whether or not the question was actually raised as to whether it was a general appropriation bill or whether they just assumed that only a limitation would be in order. I have not examined that matter; but here is a case where there could be no question but that the bill before the House was a general appropriation bill. It was the general Post Office appropriation bill, and here is the limitation that the House put upon a provision of that bill:

Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated for rural delivery service shall be used to cover any expense upon any motor-vehicle route until a majority of the patrons to be served by such motor-vehicle route shall by written petition ask the Post Office Department to establish such motor-vehicle route.

That was purely a limitation and was in order under the House rules. That came over to the Senate, just as this limitation came over. It went to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. That committee struck out that limitation, just as this committee has stricken out this limitation. That committee did not stop with striking out that limitation. It went further and proposed an amendment that was clearly legislation of a very broad character. It is a long amendment. The committee proposed to strike that out and insert:

That rural mail delivery shall be extended so as to serve, as nearly as practicable, the entire rural population of the United States.

Those are the first two lines in it—broad legislation, covering the whole United States, extending the Rural Delivery System of the country.

Hereafter—

Showing that it is intended to be permanent—real, permanent legislation—

Hereafter all rural mail-delivery routes shall be divided into two classes to be known as—

Standard horse-drawn vehicle routes, which shall be 24 miles in length; and Standard motor-vehicle routes—

And so forth.

There is a half column containing legislation pure and simple, legislation of a general character, legislation of a permanent character. When that came before the Senate the Senator from Florida [Mr. Bryan] made the point of order against it that it was legislation upon an appropriation bill, just exactly the point of order that is made here, granting for the sake of the argument only that this is a general appropriation bill. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to read the argument that was presented by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] in combating the point of order made by Mr. Bryan.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. What was the decision of the Chair?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to see if there is not something here that I want to read to the Senator, as well as the decision of the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am just asking for information.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am going to give the Senator information. They discussed a whole lot of matters here. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] argued in this way on behalf of the committee and on behalf of the action of the committee:

The committee insists to-day, just as it did yesterday to the Vice President, that the House having taken this matter up and having eliminated it from the operations of Rule XVI any substitute that the Senate committee or the Senate itself may care to adopt is before this body for full, unimpeded action by the Senate—

That is what we contend here. Granting for the sake of the argument that this is a general appropriation act, we contend that the House having acted the Senate has the right to act unimpeded by Rule XVI, because Rule XVI has been in a way obviated by the action of the House—

It would be preposterous, I think, to say that we are bound to the mere limits of the exact proposition submitted by the House, and that we can only say "yes" or "no" to the exact and precise proposition submitted by the House of Representatives. We therefore urge that view against the point of order submitted by the Senator from Florida.

Then he says:

We say on all three grounds—

He had three different grounds—that the point of order of the Senator from Florida is not good:

First, that the House of Representatives having undertaken to deal with this matter in a legislative way, the Senate has a full, free right to deal with this same question and the various branches of it in whatever way seems best to the Senate, and that the limitations under which it can deal with it are not such as are fixed by the ordinary rules of the Senate, because to the text of the House bill the ordinary rules of the Senate can not be applied.

The Presiding Officer submitted the matter to the Senate of the United States for its decision, and said:

The question is, Shall the point of order raised by the Senator from Florida be sustained?

A roll call was asked for and ordered, upon which the yeas were 13 and the nays were 37; and the Presiding Officer said.

So the point of order is overruled.

Mr. OVERMAN. Why not put the roll call in the RECORD?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from North Carolina wants to know if it would not be well to put the roll call in the RECORD. I think it would be a good idea to do that, and I think I shall.

The yeas, holding that the point of order was good, and that the legislation was not in order under Rule XVI, were 13, as follows: Messrs. Borah, Bryan, Gore, Husting, Johnson of Maine, Johnson of South Dakota, Kern, La Follette, Lee of Maryland, Smoot, Tillman, Walsh, and Williams. The nays, 37, were Messrs. Ashurst, Bankhead, Brady, Broussard, Chamberlain, Clapp, Culberson, Cummins, Curtis, Fletcher, Harding, Hardwick, Hitchcock, James, Lane, McLean, Martin of Virginia, Martine of New Jersey, Myers, Nelson, Norris, Oliver, Overman, Page, Poindexter, Shafroth, Sheppard, Sherman, Shields, Simmons, Smith of Georgia, Sterling, Thompson, Townsend, Vardaman, Weeks, and Works.

Mr. President, the Senators who voted to sustain the point of order are fully justified, in view of the decision of the Senate, in accepting the verdict of the Senate upon this question, which is squarely upon all fours with the one submitted to the Senate, and accepting that as the settled ruling and decision of the Senate. They will not be acting inconsistently to vote now against sustaining this point of order, upon the theory that when the Senate has solemnly acted upon a proposition of this kind, in order to have stability and certainty, its decisions should be followed in the future. We can maintain our rules in no other way.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I have not read the amendment offered by the Senate committee in lieu of the House amendment in the case the Senator has before him. Was there any limitation at all in the Senate proposition?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; no limitation. I have read the first few lines of it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I thought perhaps there might have been a limitation further on in the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will read the amendment in full. I do not think it would make any difference even if it did have a limitation, because it did contain legislation of the broadest and widest scope with reference to the Rural Delivery Service; but I will read the whole amendment.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The point I wanted to make clear was that the position of the House seemed to be that no matter if an amendment carries general legislation, if it also carries a general limitation which is in its nature a limitation upon the appropriation, it is in order; but if there is no limitation upon the appropriation, then it is purely general legislation, without reference to the subject matter contained in the appropriation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think the Senator does not state quite correctly the position of the House. The position of the House is that you can not put general legislation upon a general appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Unless——

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; there is no "unless" about it. You can put a limitation upon a general appropriation bill, and that is all you can do. You can prohibit the use of the money for certain purposes, but you can not go on and put in general legislation under the guise of a limitation.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am not familiar with the rule of the House; but the idea in my mind was that if the limitation itself took on the nature of and was in effect general legislation, but was a general limitation, then, despite the fact that it was general legislation, it could not be ruled out, because it was a limitation, just like this proposed prohibition amendment of the House is evidently general legislation when it says that certain things shall not be done unless the President does so and so, meaning that the very limitation itself implies general legislation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That contention strengthens my argument that the Senate can now act.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I should imagine that if the Senate struck out every limitation and then inserted a substitute without any limitation upon the appropriation in the bill, and it was a general appropriation bill, they had gone outside the scope of the amendment as it was put in in the House. Hence I say to the Senator that if the substitute proposed by the Senate committee in lieu of that of the House contained no limitation whatever, and the Senate acted as the Senator has just shown us that it did act, then it seems to me that the Senator's point is well made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will ask the Senator to notice while I read this amendment. I have not read it clear through, but I do not expect to find any limitation in it. The amendment was to strike out certain matter and insert the following:

That rural mail delivery shall be extended so as to serve, as nearly as practicable, the entire rural population of the United States.

Hereafter all rural mail-delivery routes shall be divided into two classes, to be known as—

Standard horse-drawn vehicle routes, which shall be 24 miles in length, and

Standard motor-vehicle routes, which shall be 50 miles in length, and shall only be established upon certificate of the duly qualified county road officials that the character of the roads proposed to be used, as well as climatic conditions, will warrant regular and practically uninterrupted service throughout the year.

Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prohibit the establishment of horse-drawn vehicle routes of less length than the standard of 24 miles: Provided, That if in extraordinary cases, in order to render more complete service, it should be necessary to do so, the Postmaster General is hereby authorized to increase the length of routes not to exceed 20 per cent above the standards herein prescribed: Provided further, That carriers in rural mail-delivery service shall furnish and maintain at their own expense all necessary vehicle equipment for prompt handling of the mail: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed, and no order shall be issued, to prevent the use of motor vehicles on horse-drawn vehicle routes: And provided further, That the Postmaster General may, in his discretion, allow and pay additional compensation to rural letter carriers who are required to carry pouch mail to intermediate post offices or for intersecting loop routes in all cases where it appears that the carriage of such pouches increases the expense of the equipment required by the carrier or materially increases the amount of labor performed by him, such compensation not to exceed the sum of $12 per annum for each mile such carrier is required to carry such pouch or pouches.

The Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to reorganize and readjust existing rural mail-delivery service where necessary to conform to the standards herein prescribed: Provided, That in making appointments of rural carriers for service on new routes which may be created by the reorganization herein ordered preference shall be given to carriers who were formerly employed in rural delivery service and who were separated therefrom on or after June 30, 1915, by reason of any previous reorganization of the service and without charges against them: And provided further, That the Postmaster General is authorized and directed to pay, out of the appropriations already made and still available and unexpended for rural free-delivery service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, to all letter carriers in the Rural Free Delivery Service during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, their executors or administrators, the difference between what they received for their said services and the amount that would have been paid to them in accordance with the proviso contained in joint resolution making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, approved March 4, 1915.

There is the end of it, and I fail to find any limitation of any kind or character. As a matter of fact, the Senate cut out the limitation of the House and inserted in lieu of it general legislation of a permanent character, and the Senate, by a vote of nearly 3 to 1, held it in order.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. Assuming that the first contention of the Senator is not sustained, and I hope it will be sustained, I want to ask him whether this amendment must not be treated in the same way, and if this is not merely a limitation, as far as the Senate is concerned, upon the question of germaneness; in other words, whether an amendment proposed must not be germane to the House provision in the bill in order to come within the rule which the Senator invokes?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think I just catch the point the Senator makes.

Mr. LENROOT. I am speaking now of the germaneness of the Senate amendment to the House limitation.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, if this is a general appropriation bill, then the question of germaneness must be submitted to the Senate; but if it is not a general appropriation bill, then there is no question of germaneness which arises at all.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand that. I am speaking only of the second contention.

Mr. JONES of Washington. So either way, the question should be submitted to the Senate.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true as to the question of germaneness; but I want to ask the Senator this question, then: The House limitation relates only to the use of food in the production of liquor, while the Senate committee amendment relates to the sale in part.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It goes further than the House provision. Certainly I do not think there will be any question about its being germane to that proposition, but there is nothing in these rulings here that requires the amendment of the Senate to even be germane to the proposal. Of course, that question does not seem to have been submitted or raised.

Mr. LENROOT. I was going to ask the Senator if that question had been raised.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think not. That was not the question before the Senate which was passed upon in the matter referred to. I do not know that that was ever passed upon by the Senate.

Mr. President, I think that is all, and I am not going to take the time of the Senate further in discussing this matter. It is perfectly clear to me that this is not a general appropriation bill within the general and accepted meaning of the term that is used in the rule either of the Senate or the House, but it is a bill which by its very terms shows it is a special bill that is being passed for a special purpose and is temporary in character, and it is not intended to be lasting and general or permanent; furthermore, that if it is a general appropriation bill, the Senate by its action in former cases, in view of the action taken by the House, has ruled that a point of order is not good, and, in any case, the question as to whether this is a general appropriation bill should be submitted to the Senate for the Senate to decide for itself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, the rule which limits the right to add general legislation to a general appropriation bill is most important in the conduct of the business of the Senate. General appropriation bills, not special for an individual, but dealing with the general welfare intended to help care for the general welfare of the country, are essential. It would be unfortunate if they could be loaded down by special appropriations offered on the floor of the Senate, ill advised and not well considered, or if general legislation could be added to them on the floor of the Senate, and that they should be used to carry through some pet legislation that could not stand by itself.

Now, the object of our rule, Rule XVI, is to make it possible and practicable for us to legislate with reference to appropriations that bear upon the general welfare and are general in their nature without having them subjected to additions that have not been considered by the committee or estimated for by the department.

It is this kind of general appropriations that are to be protected under Rule XVI not only from general legislation but from increased estimates or increased figures presented on the floor of the Senate not recommended by the committee or estimated for by the department.

The reason of the rule certainly applies to a bill of this kind. What is this bill? It is a bill which carries an appropriation of over $10,000,000. What is it to be used for? In many different ways all over the country for the general welfare. It is not the first appropriation bill of this session for agriculture, but is a second general appropriation bill for that department.

The first paragraph carries $1,058,975. It is to encourage the eradication of diseases among stock, the eradication of diseases among horses, to encourage live-stock production upon the plains, the production of pork, the production of poultry, the production of sheep, the production of cheese, the utilization of creamery by-products, and for other purposes.

The next paragraph has reference to seed wheat and beans. It is to help furnish seed all over the United States in different parts of it where required.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. KING. I suggest to the Senator many of these items are of the same character as those found in the Agricultural appropriation bill. They rather duplicate appropriations carried in what is denominated by all, and conceded by all, to be the general appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thank the Senator. I was coming to that after I had called attention to a few more of these items.

The third is to protect against disease among plants, $721,000.

The fourth is to increase food production generally by demonstration work. This amounts to $6,100,000 for agricultural demonstration work of all varieties all over the United States.

The fifth is for the distribution of authoritative information in connection with the demand for the production, supply, distribution, and utilization of food, preventing waste of food, for the Market Bureau to facilitate the sale of food, for a survey of the food supplies, $1,610,000.

The sixth is for the pay of Assistant Secretaries in the department, distribution of information from the department, instruction about preparation of fish and storage of fish, waterproofing leather for the Government and farm use, destruction of predatory animals, and so forth, and so forth, amounting to one million and odd dollars.

Mr. President, I have gone far enough in calling attention to the bill to show that it spreads over the entire field of agriculture. It reaches from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Lakes to the Gulf.

Now, how does it differ from the first Agricultural appropriation bill? It deals with the same subject; it is the same character of bill. Rule XVI does not say that one general appropriation bill with reference to agriculture shall be subject to its limitation. No one questions the fact that our first appropriation bill for the Agricultural Department was subject to this rule and was a general appropriation bill. This is also a general appropriation bill, because it appropriates money for agriculture all over the United States and in many, many varieties. I said it amounted to over $10,000,000. The suggestion is made to me that it amounts to nearly $20,000,000. It is territorially general. It is general as to its subjects. I will read a definition from Bouvier which seems to draw the distinction between general and special as applied to legislation:

> Laws that are framed in general terms, restricted to no locality, and operating equally upon all of a group of objects which, having regard to the purpose of the legislation, * * * laws which apply to and operate uniformly upon all members of any class of persons, places, or things.

The Senator from Washington called attention to a precedent in the Congress of 1878 or 1879. The subject was up in 1880. Attention was called then to the previous consideration of what constituted a general appropriation bill, and it was very elaborately discussed by the Senators. The question of what constituted a general appropriation bill covered by Rule XVI was separated from the other question raised, which was that the proposed amendment was general legislation upon a general appropriation bill. The particular bill then before the House was a deficiency bill.

The insistence was made that a general appropriation bill covered by Rule XVI was limited to the bill specifically named, and that a deficiency bill was not so named and not a general appropriation bill. The subject was fully considered by the Senate. On the request of Senator Edmunds it was segregated from the further proposition as to whether the amendment was general legislation, and the Senate determined to consider as a distinct and separate proposition the question whether the bill was a general appropriation covered by Rule XVI. The contention on the one side was that there were certain appropriation bills that must be presented at each session and that general appropriation bills were only those which were specifically required each term as a necessary incident to legislation providing appropriations. On the other hand, it was insisted that any appropriation bill, general in its nature, was covered by Rule XVI.

It was contended that wherever the appropriations carried funds generally throughout the country it fell within the provision of this rule and that they could not be amended upon the floor by adding appropriations not recommended by the committee and not estimated for by the department. This limitation of amendments is perhaps the most important. It is absolutely essential to protect general appropriation bills from speedy and reckless appropriations upon the floor.

Senator Edmunds contended that the emergency deficiency bill was not one of the required appropriation bills, not one of those specifically named that must always be made, but that any appropriation bill which generally distributed money supplementing a former appropriation bill upon the same subject still was a general appropriation bill just as much as the original appropriation bill was a general appropriation bill. The same view was supported by Senator Garland, of Arkansas; the same view was supported by Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts; the same view was supported by Senator Eaton, by Senator Conkling, and finally the Senate voted upon it. The question was whether the rule applied only to the first regular appropriation bill or whether the character of the bill—general or special—should be determined from the nature of the provisions of the bill under consideration. It was the same question in principle that is involved here.

We had our first Agricultural appropriation bill. We now have a second Agricultural appropriation bill, amounting to nearly $20,000,000 to be spent during the next fiscal year, just as the original appropriation provided for expenditures, and spread all over the country from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will remember that since the outbreak of the war nearly all our regular appropriation bills have been added to, sometimes several times as much, under the name perhaps of deficiencies, but they are really general appropriation bills. This case is all the more strong because deficiencies even for the Army go to the Committee on Appropriations instead of the Committee on Military Affairs; but here comes a second appropriation bill from the same committee that reported the first Agricultural appropriation bill. That can only give the supposition that on account of the war and changing conditions, not having appropriated enough the first time, they appropriate the second time and spread it over an equally large area of country, and in the way of amount it is nearly $20,000,000 as against, or in addition to, the first Agricultural appropriation bill amounting to some $28,000,000. In every way except in the title it is a general appropriation bill for the Agricultural Department.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. There is nothing in Rule XVI which limits its application to the first general appropriation bill for the Agricultural Department or the first general appropriation bill for the Army or the first general appropriation bill for the Navy, but it declares if the bill is a general appropriation bill increased appropriation can not be made upon the floor of the Senate unless estimated for by the department or unless recommended by the committee. As the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] has said, during the past 12 months our second appropriation bills for the Army have been perhaps even larger than the first, and this appropriation bill carries to the Department of Agriculture about half as much as the first.

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator give us his idea of an appropriation bill that is not a general appropriation bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes; I can very easily name one. Suppose you have a special appropriation to pay a particular pension. Suppose you have a special appropriation to pay a particular Indian claim. Suppose you have an appropriation to build a bridge or to put up a public building. The general bill for buildings would be general legislation, but it could be so confined to one locality or one purpose that it would be classed as special legislation rather than general.

Mr. WALSH. So, as I understand the Senator, in the case of a general public building bill the rule applies, but if an appropriation were made for the purpose of constructing a post-office building at Savannah, Ga., the rule would not apply.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. This particular rule would not. I do not think it would be classed as a general appropriation bill.

Mr. WALSH. Then, just one other question. I want to know, then, from the Senator how many items there must be in the second bill in order to make it a general appropriation bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would not be able to decide it simply by items. It must be so general in its nature; general in territorial effect.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. Would not one line of distinction be that where it applied to the department for the fiscal year it would pretty nearly be a general bill?

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator is discussing Rule XVI, section 3. Section 4 reads:

> No amendment the object of which is to provide for a private claim shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if it would not be competent for the Senate to attach a private claim to this bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I would prefer not to suspend my remarks for a colloquy between the Senator from California and the Senator from Montana.

Mr. PHELAN. Very well; I will raise the question in my own time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will be glad for the Senator to do it later.

I was coming to the action of the Senate upon this question. I have called attention to the arguments presented in the Senate by Senator Edmunds, by Senator Garland, by Senator Hoar, and by Senator Eaton in support of the proposition that although it was a second appropriation bill on the same subject, although the regular first appropriation bill had been passed for the particular department, the subsequent appropriation bill if it was general in its nature should be classed as a general appropriation bill and fall within this rule.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. One moment. What I desired to do was to present the final vote by the Senate upon this subject. After full discussion, after calling attention to the fact that there had been varying rules by the Senate prior to that time, the ruling called attention by the Senator from Washington being one of them, the subject was submitted to the Senate for determination without a ruling by the Presiding Officer, and the vote stood 47 to 4. Among those who voted to sustain the view that the second appropriation bill, if it was general in its character, fell within the limitation of this rule as a general appropriation bill were such men as Senator Bayard, Senator Beck, Senator Carpenter, Senator Conkling, Senator Dawes, Senator Eaton, Senator Edmunds, Senator Garland, Senator Hampton, Senator Harris, Senator Hill of Georgia, Senator Hoar, Senator Ingalls, and many others.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator from Georgia if the bill under consideration there was not the ordinary general deficiency bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. In that particular case it was a general deficiency bill, but the general deficiency bill is not one of those named in the list.

Mr. WALSH. Quite true. A general deficiency bill, as I understand the matter, is intended to take care of deficiencies that may occur in the appropriations made for the various departments of the Government—a general deficiency bill to take care of all deficiencies; but I ask the Senator from Georgia now if there is a special deficiency bill, not to take care of deficiencies generally in all the departments, but a deficiency bill to take care of deficiencies only in one branch—the Agricultural Department, for instance—would the same rule apply?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The same rule has been applied to an urgent deficiency bill, and going beyond the general deficiency bill.

Mr. WALSH. But is not that one of the bills that are regularly and ordinarily passed at each succeeding session of Congress?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. An urgent deficiency bill is not necessarily so.

Mr. WALSH. Has there been any session which the Senator from Georgia has attended when that has not been done—when an urgent deficiency bill has not been considered?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not recall such a case.

Mr. WALSH. Neither do I.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the general deficiency appropriation bill is not one of the regular appropriations that must be brought forward. It would not be brought forward unless a deficiency existed.

Mr. WALSH. Just one further question: Is it not denominated "the urgent deficiency bill"; not "an urgent deficiency bill," but "the urgent deficiency bill"?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think the manner of its denomination at all settles whether or not it is a general appropriation bill.

Mr. WALSH. But is it not persuasive that it is a bill that is regularly passed?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; I do not think so. This pending bill is a bill "to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30," and so forth. It applies to the whole year; it applies to continued work; it applies to the whole country; it applies to a great department; and it applies to no one locality, but to all localities. It is just as general as was the first appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture; and there is nothing in our rules which says that we shall only recognize as a general appropriation bill the first general appropriation bill for a department. We determine not whether it is the first or the second bill but whether the appropriations for the department are general. The reason for the rule is just as strong on an appropriation of this kind as it would be on the first appropriation. The reason is to protect this general appropriation bill, which is large in size, spreading through all localities, spreading to diversified interests, from being loaded down with special appropriations offered on the floor; from being loaded down with general legislation on the floor. There is just as much reason for protecting this bill as there was for protecting the first general appropriation bill in reference to this department.

Mr. WALSH. If the Senator will pardon another interruption, I desire to say that I fully agree with him, that it does not make a bit of difference about which bill comes first. If it is of interest to the Senator, I would say, that my own idea about it is that the general Agricultural appropriation bill is the bill that makes provision for the usual and ordinary expenditures of that department, which provides for the salary of the chief and the salaries for all of his subordinates and all of his clerks, and which makes the usual and ordinary appropriations for that purpose. That, I understand, is the general Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is a general Agricultural appropriation bill; but this rule is not limited to that general appropriation bill. The general bills mentioned in this rule are:

The bill making appropriations for rivers and harbors, to the Committee on Commerce; the Agricultural bill, to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; the Army and Military Academy bills, to the Committee on Military Affairs; the Indian bill, to the Committee on Indian Affairs; the naval bill, to the Committee on Naval Affairs; the pension bill, to the Committee on Pensions; the Post Office bill, to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; and no amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation already contained in the bill, or to add a new item of appropriation, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law or treaty stipulation.

It will be observed that after naming certain committees to which certain appropriation bills shall be referred the rules proceed:

No amendments shall be received to any general appropriation bill the effect of which will be to increase an appropriation—

And so forth.

The prohibition is against certain amendments to "any general appropriation" bill, not simply to those general appropriation bills named.

That is the first portion of the rule. The line of thought pressed in the particular case to which I have referred was that certain general appropriation bills were mentioned in this rule, and that a deficiency bill was not mentioned and would not be covered by the rule. The question was whether the language of the rule should be broadly applied to any bill which was a general appropriation bill. Upon that subject the view, I think, was soundly presented that the reason of the rule should be considered. The reason of the rule, first, was to protect a large appropriation bill, one general in its effect, from being loaded down and made a carrying vehicle for increases and special items presented upon the floor, for which the department had never estimated and which the committee had never recommended.

Mr. BRANDEGEE rose.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is the first limitation, and perhaps the most important; and as was urged by Senator Edmunds, I think, with so much force in the case which I have cited, the same reason for protecting one general appropriation bill would apply to protecting another, even though it were the second bill for the same department at the same session of Congress.

I now yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I was going to suggest to the Senator from Georgia, inasmuch as the phrase "general appropriation bill" has never been accurately defined by a rule of the Senate, but simply voted this way and voted that way on particular bills, if he does not take the view that the object of the rule as to a general appropriation bill is to protect the supply bills of the Government from general legislation and from particular legislation, and to keep them separate from all other contested matters?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That is just the view I was seeking to urge, and that was just the view which was pressed so vigorously by the Senators who finally secured from the Senate, upon this exact question, an almost overwhelming vote; that the supply bills, these general appropriation bills, whether the first supply bill for the department or the second supply bill for the department, the important question being that it was a supply bill for the Government, general in its nature, and which must be protected, whether the first one or the second one or the third.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And the word "general" does not mean "universal," or anything of that kind, but that it means an appropriation for a governmental function—a supply bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The contention at that time was that as certain bills were named in the rule—the Agricultural bill to the Committee on Agriculture; the bill to make appropriations for rivers and harbors to the Committee on Commerce, and so forth—it simply meant the first one that they must introduce, the regular one that must come, but did not mean to apply to subsequent ones on the same line. The reply was that the reason of the rule must be considered, which was to protect these supply bills from improper loading, whether by increased appropriations or by ill considered or general legislation; that these supply bills must have a chance to be enacted into legislation without being loaded down with other measures.

As I have already stated, I repeat, only four Senators, after elaborate discussion of this question, failed to agree with the view that the supply bills would be considered as general appropriation bills, whether the first supply bill for the department or the second or the third. Since that time urgent deficiency bills, all classes of supply bills, whether first, second, or third, so far as I have seen, have been regarded as general appropriation bills.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand the contention of the Senator from Georgia is that the committees having the duty of providing for the expenditures of the great departments are not compelled to include all the items or subjects of expenditure in one bill, if they should see fit, after we have passed one appropriation bill for that purpose, to bring in another appropriation bill; that, if the committee should afterwards decide to bring in another bill dealing with the general subjects committed to that particular department, the fact that it did not bring in these items of expenditure in the first bill would not remove the second bill from the character of being a general appropriation bill, but that it is still given the protection of this rule of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from North Carolina has stated my contention exactly; and, as he states it, the importance and soundness of it is evident, for to take from the committee that privilege, to subject all but the first supply bills from a committee to all kinds of amendments, without regard to the estimates by the department or action by the committee, would endanger every subsequent supply bill and would handicap legislation without any reason whatever.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Georgia is entirely right; but, to make it stronger, if subsequent to the passage of a general appropriation bill Congress should create in a particular department an entirely new service, involving large governmental expenditures, the Senator would hold, I take it, that the committee might bring in a second bill making appropriations to pay the expense of that special service?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is very clear, is it not?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, I ask the Senator if, in substance, that is not just what has happened in this case? The Agricultural Department is a permanent institution——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I had about finished what I wanted to say, and I yield the floor to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to know the Senator's idea about this.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would like to suggest that the Chair of necessity must limit debate, and, after the Senator has finished, the Chair is going to indicate very strongly his willingness to decide the question, because to occupy the chair hour after hour, as the present occupant must necessarily do out of courtesy to the Senate, is of course a considerable punishment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am not going to occupy any time. My only purpose is to fortify the argument made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH], and I was presenting to him a view that probably had not occurred to him. I had just inquired of the Senator if, subsequently to the passage of the regular appropriation bill, Congress should pass an act creating a new service in the department, involving large appropriations, and the committee should bring in a second bill appropriating the money necessary to execute the powers and functions provided for by the new legislation, if that would not clearly be a general appropriation bill, as much so as the original appropriation bill?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think so; undoubtedly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Now, Mr. President, the point I propose to make is—and I want to know if it has the approval of the judgment of the Senator from Georgia—that Congress passed on the 10th of August, 1917, an act the title of which is "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products." That act confers upon the Secretary of Agriculture large powers; it imposes duties upon him which are to be performed and which can not be performed without increasing the organization of his department and largely increasing the expenditures of his department. In that act appropriations were made, but to a large extent they were lump-sum appropriations. One of the lump-sum appropriations was for $850,000; another lump-sum appropriation was for $2,500,000; another for $441,000 and another for $2,522,000. Thus lump-sum appropriations were made for the purpose of carrying out the duties imposed upon the Secretary of Agriculture by that act. In the bill which we are discussing here to-day, and which it is proposed to amend, instead of providing the Secretary of Agriculture with lump sums to pay the expenses of this service the committee has seen fit to reduce those appropriations to special or specific appropriations covering the estimated expenditure for doing the various and sundry things imposed upon the Secretary of Agriculture in that act.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will permit me one word further, then I will yield to him. This is, therefore, an appropriation intended to carry out an additional service created in the Agricultural Department, and it appropriates specifically, not merely for one thing he is to do; it appropriates not one particular amount for a particular service, but it purports to appropriate the entire amount that is necessary to accomplish the purposes and to perform the services required of him by that act. In other words, this is a new service created in the department, calling for expenditures aggregating $19,000,000 in small sums, and the appropriations for that service are made by this bill. Therefore, Mr. President, this bill is for the purpose of carrying out the specific legislation referred to, and is as much a general appropriation bill as the first Agricultural appropriation bill, which was for the purpose of carrying out the functions heretofore permanently invested in the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. The appropriations of which the Senator speaks as being provided for in lump sums were in the act of August 10, 1917.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. And the Senator says, does he, that this particular appropriation bill, if he calls it that, now before the Senate, is to make the same kind of appropriations authorized in that act?

Mr. SIMMONS. Oh, no; not the same kind of appropriations; but the very title of the act——

Mr. NORRIS. Well, making them in detail, instead of in lump sums?

Mr. SIMMONS. The very title of the bill that we are considering now is:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out during the fiscal year 1919 the purposes of the act—

The one to which I have referred—entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. These are the same kind of appropriations, then, that were contained in that act, as I understand?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; the original act made certain lump-sum appropriations——

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that, and this bill itemizes them.

Mr. SIMMONS. While this bill very much broadens the scope of the activities of the department. The new activities of the department——

Mr. NORRIS. What I want to ask the Senator is this——

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me until I finish the sentence—the new activities of the department as first organized and, according probably to the first estimates which were presented to the committee, were circumscribed, and the amounts required were small compared with the amounts required now; but that service has been expanding and enlarging; and now the Secretary of Agriculture comes to the committee with his estimates, and those estimates amount to $19,000,000, divided up probably into 50 or 60 different items.

Mr. NORRIS. The question I want to ask the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. It is an expansion of the service; that is all.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; I will.

Mr. NORRIS. In as much as the Senator argues that the appropriations now before the Senate simply provide for doing in detail what the act of August 10 did by lump-sum appropriations, I want to ask him if that argument is not good as to——

Mr. SIMMONS. That was not my argument, if the Senator will pardon me.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the idea I got of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The argument I made was that this bill purports to appropriate all the money which the Agricultural Department estimates will be necessary to carry out the general legislation contained in the act of August 10, 1917.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator said just a moment ago that the appropriations as made by the act of August 10 were in lump sums, while now they are itemized.

Mr. SIMMONS. The first appropriation was for the service contemplated then.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. But the service has, under the provisions of the act, as was legitimate and proper, been largely expanded and extended.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but, it seems to me—and I want to ask the Senator if this is not the conclusion we must come to—if the Senator's argument is true, and this is a general appropriation bill, then the act of August 10, 1917, was also a general appropriation bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. For that service; yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires, if there be no further debate on this subject——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The SECRETARY called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Henderson	Nugent	Smoot
Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Sterling
Beckham	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Sutherland
Benet	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Swanson
Brandegee	Kellogg	Poindexter	Thomas

Chamberlain	Kenyon	Reed	Trammell
Colt	King	Saulsbury	Underwood
Curtis	Knox	Shafroth	Vardaman
Fletcher	Lenroot	Sheppard	Wadsworth
France	Lewis	Shields	Walsh
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Simmons	Warren
Gerry	Martin	Smith, Ariz.	Watson
Gore	Myers	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
Hale	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Harding	New	Smith, Mich.
Hardwick	Norris	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

The point of order which has been raised by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the amendment reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to the pending bill, the Chair thinks, is one which he ought to decide, because his views are quite clear on it, from such examination as he has been able to give it since the point was made yesterday and from the arguments which he has heard to-day. The Chair thinks it unnecessary to go deeply into the reasons for his decision. The arguments have been very able, both by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and have covered the ground very thoroughly.

There is no doubt in the mind of the Chair that the amendment proposed is general legislation. On the question as to whether this bill is a general appropriation bill the Chair is equally clear, not understanding how such a great variety of subjects may be appropriated for in a bill carrying as this does, by varying estimates, as the Chair has heard from the floor, from eleven to twenty-two million dollars, and, as the Chair conceives, either appropriating or affecting appropriations for over $17,000,000, without its being a general appropriation bill.

The Chair, therefore, sustains the point of order made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I call for the yeas and nays on the appeal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington appeals from the decision of the Chair. The question the Senate will decide is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, a vote in the affirmative is to sustain the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A vote in the affirmative is to sustain the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President I want to take just a moment of the time of the Senate, for I think I ought to do so in justice to myself.

The Senate knows that whenever a question of suspending the rules of the Senate has been before the Senate I have stated that I never would vote to suspend the rules unless something of vital interest to my country was at stake. I have also stated that whenever I thought a ruling of the Chair was in conformity with the rules of the Senate I never would vote against that ruling.

Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of nation-wide prohibition. I shall vote for prohibition whenever I get a chance, but I believe that the ruling of the Chair is a correct one under our rules, and therefore I shall vote to sustain the Chair in his ruling. If it is overruled, I shall then vote for the amendment offered.

I do not think it is necessary for me to go into details as to why I think the ruling is correct. I would have done so, but the Chair announced that he had heard all that he cared to hear upon that point. Therefore I shall not take any more of the time of the Senate, except to say that as I believe the ruling of the Chair is correct I shall have to vote to sustain that ruling.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to say by way of explanation, that I shall be obliged to vote to sustain the decision of the Chair. I shall do so because I think the ruling was in accordance with the rules of the Senate.

I think there can be no doubt that the pending amendment is general legislation. The only question that is really open to controversy, as I see it, is the question as to whether or not the pending bill is a general appropriation bill. I regret to say that in my judgment it is, because there are certain amendments in relation to wheat and cotton which I should like to offer to this bill if they were not subject to a point of order.

I may say that this conviction of mine not only arises from the character of the bill itself, but when this bill was pending in the House of Representatives a point of order was made to the proviso proposed to be stricken out, and the presiding officer in the House held that the bill was an appropriation bill. He held that it was an appropriation bill of the character which must originate in the House of Representatives, and which can originate in the House of Representatives alone.

To my mind that ruling of the presiding officer in the House was not only correct but it is in great measure binding upon this body. The only question in the mind of the presiding officer in the House was as to whether or not this was a limitation upon an appropriation bill. There was no doubt indicated that it was an appropriation bill; and I may say that, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, I feel obliged to protect an appropriation bill, so far as I can, against general legislation. I speak generally upon that point, and not with special reference to the pending amendment.

Mr. President, I desire to have printed in the RECORD the ruling of the Chair upon the point of order in the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator desire to have it printed or read?

Mr. GORE. I will not ask to have it read if other Senators do not desire it, but I should like to have it printed in the RECORD, as showing the decision on this point in the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Oklahoma is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. A different principle from that of germaneness is involved in the point of order to this amendment. If the Chair understands the amendment it is intended as a limitation on the payment of any money under this paragraph until the President has issued a certain indicated proclamation which in his discretion he may, or may not issue. This amendment does not compel him to issue it, but so long as it is unissued the House does not propose, if the amendment is adopted, to allow the Agricultural Department to have the benefit of the appropriation in this paragraph. In other words, the amendment proposes to utilize the right of the House to appropriate, or not to appropriate, in its discretion, to an object authorized by law. This of course is the fundamental principle upon which this amendment must depend.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the Chairman will permit——

The CHAIRMAN. In a moment. This amendment does not compel the President to issue the proclamation referred to. He may issue it, or refuse to issue it in his discretion. But the amendment in substance says to the Department of Agriculture, we propose to withhold from you the benefit of this appropriation during the full period of time during which this proclamation is unissued. That may be a very unreasonable ground for the House to take, but after all is not this question merely one of competency, or power, resting upon our authority to refuse or award an appropriation? If we choose to withhold it, who is to say nay to us? We can be unreasonable, if we choose to be unreasonable.

The matter proposed to be dealt with is an appropriation of money, and this body has the absolute power to determine whether it will, or will not appropriate. In the exercise of that power we may do unreasonable things, arbitrary things, whimsical and absurd things, but after all the question is whether, with respect to the action proposed, we are within our powers and within our rules—in a word, whether this is a limitation, in a parliamentary sense, on an appropriation bill. The Chair is not altogether certain in his own mind that this amendment in the form submitted is strictly and technically a limitation, and being in doubt he resolves that doubt in favor of the amendment, and remits the same to the determination of the committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I do not think this controversy should turn upon the question as to whether this is a general or a special appropriation bill. Conceding that it is a general appropriation bill, I do not think the amendment is properly subject to the point of order.

It has been held in the Senate recently that whenever the House opens a particular subject in a general appropriation bill and makes it a part of that appropriation bill, the Senate may proceed with it and enlarge it, although the amendment may be, in reality, general legislation. Let me say in this connection that the Randall amendment opened the subject of prohibition in connection with this appropriation bill in the House. Complying, therefore, with its own precedents, the Senate has a perfect right to enlarge the proposition, to continue the legislation, and to deal with the subject in a larger degree, although the amendment in question may be conceded to be general legislation. I do not consider, however, that this prohibition amendment is general legislation in spirit and in effect, because it is special, emergency legislation offered in connection with the emergency of the present war and limited to the duration of the war.

I now desire to call the attention of the Senate to a decision on the subject of general legislation by former Vice President Fairbanks. He said:

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] makes the point of order that the pending amendment contravenes paragraph 3 of Rule XVI, which provides: "No amendment which proposes general legislation shall be received to any general appropriation bill." What is general legislation upon a general appropriation bill under Rule XVI has long been a sharply debated question. The rule is an old one. It has been frequently invoked, and the discussion has invariably disclosed the same conflicting views which have been expressed with respect to the point of order now interposed.

The question there was whether an amendment making the salary of the Speaker of the House of Representatives $20,000 per annum was general legislation in connection with a general appropriation bill. Mr. Fairbanks submitted the matter to the Senate, and the Senate decided that the amendment could be attached to a general appropriation bill.

There is no well-defined uniform line of decisions, either by the Chair or by the Senate, when the question has been submitted by the Chair to its determination or when the question has been brought before it by an appeal from the decision of the Chair. The impression created upon the mind of the present occupant of the chair, after a somewhat careful and thorough examination of the subject, is that the Senate has been largely controlled in its interpretation of the rule for more than a third of a century by a consideration of the public interest involved at the time being, rather than by any regard for its technical meaning or strict application.

And such is the situation that confronts us to-day—the question of the public interest, rather than any technical matter of parliamentary law.

Mr. President, the Senate held on a former occasion that the Jones-Works excise law, establishing an elaborate system of regulation for the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia, was not general legislation under the rules and precedents of the Senate, and permitted the Jones-Works excise law to be enacted in connection with the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

As Vice President Fairbanks has said, the process of deciding what is general legislation on appropriation bills is frequently made a method of developing the views of the Senate on great public questions. This is an opportunity to obtain war-time prohibition, and to obtain it under the precedents of the Senate. This vital fact overshadows all others. I beg to express the earnest hope, therefore, that the decision of the Chair will be respectfully overruled.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I thought that the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], who is always frank, would before he sat down tell us what he really wanted the Senate to do, and the grounds upon which he wanted the Senate to act. I fully understand, and the Senate now understands, that the Senator from Texas wants this point of order overruled, not upon its merits, but he wants the rules of the Senate disregarded because he wants to force immediate prohibition upon the country. He is very frank about that; and if a man is going to break down the rules of a body of which he is a Member it is commendable that he should avow his purpose.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I simply took the position occupied by a former Vice President of the United States.

Mr. REED. No; the former Vice President, in a critical way, speaking of past action of the Senate, in substance and effect, said that the Senate had trespassed upon its duty by deciding questions not according to their merits but according to the wishes of the Members. I take it that his statement was a criticism. I could regard it as nothing else than as equivalent to saying of and concerning the judge of a court that he decided a case, not according to the law, but according to his own desires.

Mr. President, since the Senator presents that aspect of the case—which ought not to be the controlling matter, because these questions ought to be decided in a manner that will preserve the integrity of the rules of the body, for a body without rules soon becomes a lawless body—since he has raised the question in this direct way, let me state very briefly just what the situation is. I shall be very brief.

Prior to July 3 the Senate and the House of Representatives passed a bill prohibiting the sale of liquors in the District of Columbia. It was brought forward as a war measure. On August 1, 1917, the Senate passed a joint resolution submitting to the States nation-wide prohibition. It was generally understood at that time that that would end prohibition agitation in the Senae, and that the question would be turned over to the great referendum of the States. But only a few days passed until we had before us an act to provide for the national security and defense by encouraging the production and controlling the distribution of food products, and it was at that time that the controversy was again brought forward of prohibition; and at that time this amendment was written in the bill, and it is now the law of the land. I want to call attention to it:

That from and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act no foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds shall be used in the production of distilled spirits for beverage purposes; * * * nor—

I make some omissions that are immaterial—

nor shall there be imported into the United States any distilled spirits.

Now, notice this language:

Whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any such malt or vinous liquor, is essential, in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food, or that the national security and defense will be subserved thereby, he is authorized, from time to time, to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated.

So, Mr. President, at the present time, by the express act of Congress and as a part of our war legislation, the President of the United States is vested with plenary power to immediately prohibit, if he deems it for the public welfare or in the interest of the prosecution of this war, the manufacture or sale of a single additional particle of liquor of any kind. In the conduct of this war we have trusted him with regulating the number of men who shall be called forth and the character of our men who shall be called forth. We have trusted him absolutely as to the number of men to be sent abroad. We have given him a discretion to expend billions upon billions of money. We have given him the power to build ships costing billions of money. We have trusted him in all of these things; and there has been no man who has more urgently insisted that the President should be trusted in all things than the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD]. He has stood upon the floor of the Senate and in substance and effect said that even though the Constitution of the United States stood in the way, he would, if the President desired, vote for its abrogation.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, will the Senator repeat that statement?

Mr. REED. I say that in substance and effect the Senator from Texas has upon this floor said that even though the Constitution of the United States stood in the way, he would, if requested by the President of the United States, vote in its teeth.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. REED. Then I have misunderstood many statements made by the Senator. I have certainly misunderstood him, and the rest of the Senate have misunderstood him.

Now, I say this: I have not been one of those who have said that Congress should absolutely lay aside its discretion in matters of public legislation. There are certain questions, however, that are very largely executive, and here is a proposition that is before the President to-day: Revenue to carry on the war; such action as will not disturb business conditions by giving them a violent wrench; such action as will not produce discontent among certain classes of people. In other words, a moderate and temperate and wise discretion ought to be used. We vested that power in the President. He has reduced the alcoholic content of these liquors. He has proceeded along a line which has made for temperance. He has the power under the law as it stands to-day to absolutely prohibit; and I say that the wise thing to do is not to endeavor to force his hand, is not to endeavor to coerce and compel him. The wise thing to do is to trust the President upon this matter, because it is a question with many angles at the present time that ought to be considered from many standpoints; and surely nobody will claim that the President is a whisky man, or that he is in any way aligned with those interests.

I present these considerations upon the merits, since the merits have been entered into.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, feeling constrained to support the appeal taken from the ruling of the Chair, I feel moved to state briefly the considerations which impel me to that course.

When this question was first precipitated I felt entirely satisfied that the bill under consideration fell within the rule forbidding general legislation upon a general appropriation bill; but upon further reflection I can not reach the conclusion that the bill before us is such a bill as it was contemplated when this rule was framed should be within its scope.

Mr. President, all must agree that not all appropriation bills come within this particular rule. It is only general appropriation bills to which amendments carrying general legislation can not be attached. It becomes necessary, therefore, for each Senator, in resolving this particular question, to determine in his own mind what is a general appropriation bill and what is a special appropriation bill.

I am certain that in many cases the solution of that question will be involved in a great deal of doubt. It will often be difficult to know what is a general appropriation bill and what is a special appropriation bill; and no one can be blamed if, with respect to any particular bill, different opinions may prevail.

Mr. President, I have before me—because in the pertinent remarks of the President pro tempore in ruling on the question the amount carried by this particular bill was adverted to—House bill 11250, passed by that body and now before the Mines and Mining Committee. That is an appropriation bill. It carries an appropriation of $10,000,000, but I apprehend that no one would contend that it is a general appropriation bill. In the course of the discussion some one has suggested that the words "general appropriation bill" in the rule under consideration are synonymous with "supply bill." I dare say that, in a general way, that is correct; but, Mr. President, this appropriation bill is in that sense, and in a very proper sense, a supply bill. It places this whole amount of $10,000,000 in the hands of the Secretary of the Interior, and practically in the hands of the Director of the Bureau of Mines; it makes provision for adding to the Bureau of Mines a large number of employees; it makes provision for the compensation of all of those employees; and yet I undertake to say that no one will contend that this particular bill is a general appropriation bill, or that it falls within the class of bills referred to in this particular rule.

My idea of what is a general appropriation bill was indicated in the course of a colloquy between myself and the senior Senator from the State of Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. My idea about a general appropriation bill is that it is that kind of a bill which takes care of the ordinary and usual and legitimate expenditures of the various departments of the Government, and in that sense is a supply bill; that is to say, it is a bill making appropriations for the various departments of the Government, without which the department could not operate at all. It makes provision for the salary of the head of the department; it makes provision for the payment of all of his subordinates; it makes provision for all the ordinary activities of that particular department.

Mr. President, the rule is undoubtedly more comprehensive than that. It undoubtedly includes a general deficiency bill, making provision for deficiencies that exist in the appropriations for all of the departments. It doubtless includes the urgent deficiency bill, which includes likewise deficiencies that may be regarded as urgent; but, Mr. President, when that kind of a bill is passed, when the bill is passed taking care of the usual expenditures of the Government, without which the department can not carry on its operations, we have passed the general appropriation bill with reference to that department.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I will ask the Senator to pardon me for just a moment. Now, then, after we have passed a bill of that character, if any particular department comes before us, as the Department of the Interior did in the case of the bill to which I have adverted, and desires to have an appropriation made for some particular purpose or purposes not covered in the general appropriation bill, or to have some further appropiations made in addition to those made in the bill, that, in my judgment, becomes a special appropriation bill, and is not subject to the rule.

I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator will no doubt remember that there is already on the statute books a law that prevents deficiencies being created. I will admit that it has been violated by every department of the Government, but a deficiency is against existing law. If the officials would adhere to the law, there never would be a deficiency bill; there could not be one. I will admit that upon nearly every deficiency bill there is general legislation reported from the committee and added on the floor, but always by unanimous consent; but in my opinion if there was a point of order made against general legislation upon any deficiency bill it would go out on a point of order, and I think it ought to. Therefore the question of a deficiency bill, in my opinion, has nothing whatever to do with this discussion. We are discussing general appropriation bills.

I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. GORE. I was going to remind the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The Department of Agriculture prepared estimates on which the pending bill is based, as estimates are required by law.

Mr. SMOOT. Did the estimates come to the committee through the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. GORE. I think they went to the Speaker of the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course if they were sent to the Speaker of the House by the Secretary of the Treasury they would be laid before the committee.

Mr. GORE. I am not certain whether they were transmitted to the Speaker of the House or to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. The estimates always go to the House first, unless the bill has passed the House, and then the estimates are sent to the Senate.

Mr. GORE. They were regular estimates, in accordance with law.

Mr. WALSH. I recognize the force of the argument made by the Senator to the effect that a general deficiency bill does not fall within the condemnation of the rule.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I will yield in just a moment. However, the Senate has ruled otherwise in the case referred to by the Senator from Georgia, and in my judgment correctly ruled, because that was clearly a bill general in character. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. Can the rule that is invoked in this instance have application to the real situation? Here is the House bill, which contains a provision attempting to compel the President to suspend the furnishing of cereals for the manufacture of beer. The liquor question is involved. The House has legislated on it. Now, have we not a right to take up that provision of the House, which we attempt to do by this amendment to strike out, and to insert in place of that provision our own amendment? Can the rule invoked in this case have an application to a case of that kind, where we are legislating on the same subject matter on which the House has legislated? The House bill undertakes to compel the President to enforce an absolute embargo upon the production of liquors by preventing the use of cereals. We say by our substitute, "No; we will not adopt that plan. We will make an absolute prohibition." Under those circumstances can the rule invoked here have any application?

Mr. WALSH. I am disposed to agree with the view expressed by the Senator from Minnesota on that aspect of the question that is now before the Senate, but having satisfied my own mind upon the other point, I had not given the consideration to it which I would have done if I were called upon to base my vote upon that point alone.

I have but a word to add, Mr. President, to what I have said concerning the question as to whether this is a general appropriation bill. It has been said, and said with much force, and I do not know but said with a force that makes the thing almost indisputable, that there is just as much reason for excluding general legislation from a bill of this character as there is from a bill such as the general Agricultural appropriation bill which passed the House some time ago, and which is now before the President of the United States. With that view I entertain no difference. The fact is that in the constitutions of many of our States provision has been made that no bill, no matter what the subject is, shall include two separate and distinct subjects, and that for the purpose obviously of preventing logrolling legislation.

But, Mr. President, such a provision was not incorporated in our Federal Constitution, and the Members of the House and Senate in endeavoring to frame their rules did not recognize that the evil at which those provisions are directed extended further than what they denominated the general appropriation bills.

Mr. President, it seems quite clear to me that what they meant by that was, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], the general supply bills of the Government. In other words, they did not intend to have the President of the United States compelled to indorse by his signature legislation which was incorporated upon a bill which, if he vetoed, would leave some great department or branch of the Government without any funds whatever to carry on its operation. That arm of the Government would be entirely paralyzed if he vetoed that bill, and therefore he would be under a very great constraint to sign the bill and thus give his approval to legislation which his judgment condemned.

But, Mr. President, it is said that a bill might come from the War Department, for instance, that would carry an appropriation for a very vital purpose and that the evil would exist there. I grant that, Mr. President; but so a bill might come from the War Department which did not carry any appropriation at all that is extremely vital to the proper conduct of the war, and yet you can attach to that bill an amendment which is not germane to the subject with which it deals, and the President would be under the same kind of constraint. In other words, Mr. President, that argument sheds no light whatever upon the question as to whether this particular bill or any particular bill is a general appropriation bill or a special appropriation bill.

Mr. President, we have to pass the general Agricultural appropriation bill, a bill which is necessary in order that the Department of Agriculture may function at all. It is the general supply bill for that department of the Government. Anything else that comes in, in my humble judgment, is a special appropriation bill for special purposes and not for the general purposes for which the usual supply bill was passed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely wish to emphasize the point brought out by the Senator from Minnesota, which it seems to me the Senate is likely to overlook in this matter, and which apparently the Chair overlooked. The Chair simply found that this is a general appropriation bill, and then upon that basis held that this amendment is legislation, and therefore out of order, but the Chair did not refer to the action of the Senate heretofore in holding that when the House acted upon a matter, no matter how slightly it may have opened the door, the Senate is at liberty to explore the whole field.

I simply want to call the attention of Senators to this point. Granting, merely for the sake of the argument, that here is a general appropriation bill and the House has acted upon this subject, it is entirely in order for the Senate to apply such action as it sees fit to take, and even granting the position stated by the Chair, this appeal should be sustained because of the action of the House upon the matter. The Senate simply desires to submit its proposal instead of the proposal of the House.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, just a word. There is a difference of opinion among able, learned parliamentarians as to whether this is a general or special appropriation bill. There is no doubt in my mind about the necessity for legislation such as is embodied in the amendment against which the point of order has been made.

I am going to resolve the doubt in favor of this amendment, and I do not think I will be violating any rule of the Senate when I vote against sustaining the ruling of the Chair. I want this legislation enacted, as the country demands it, and if the Senate makes a rule that permits it to be attached to this bill it will but follow precedents that have been established by the Senate for many years.

A measure which contains as much merit as there is in this amendment should not be defeated for a mere trifling technicality. To do so would be to sacrifice substantial substance for a mere shadow. The rules of the Senate are not so sacred, nor were they intended to defeat or prevent salutary legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] a question. Does not the Senator believe that a bill embodying the very principles of this amendment can be introduced in the Senate and passed within a very short time? Does not the Senator know that there are a majority of the Senate in favor of nation-wide prohibition, and could it not be passed by a regular bill through the regular parliamentary stages and become a law within a very short time? I am informed that the majority of the House are in favor of the legislation, and I think that ought to be done if the amendment is eliminated from this appropriation bill?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have very serious doubt as to whether we can get it through the Senate as a separate measure. Our rules permit almost unlimited debate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if there are a majority of the Senate in favor of it we certainly can. There are three or four chances a day to move to take it up and make it the unfinished business. If the Senator thinks the committee will not report it out, I think the majority of the Senate will instruct the committee to report it out. I can not see why we can not get action on such a bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Within the last year and a half we have seen measures for which four-fifths of the Senate voted on final passage suspended and blocked by a few Senators for months.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think they can possibly block it if pushed with vigor and made the unfinished business and keep it before the Senate, and not take a recess from Monday to Thursday or from Thursday to Monday, but hold a session every day and begin at 12 o'clock. I am quite sure that Senators could not block it, and I think we can pass such legislation.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I merely want to say in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Utah that it is only necessary to look back over the history of this legislation for the last seven or eight years to find out how very difficult it is to get a straight fight upon the proposition. In my humble judgment, if a bill were brought in here and undertaken to be made the unfinished business and kept before the Senate until it was passed, we would have a recess in very short order until next August or September.

Mr. SMOOT. Generally speaking, perhaps that is true where legislation is not of such vital interest as this; but in the past, the Senator knows, this class of legislation has not been strongly pushed on the part of the Senate. I know the sentiment in its favor is growing, and I have no doubt but that it will come either this way or by the regular passage of a bill. I have no doubt but that the legislation will be accomplished in the very near future.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I merely wish to express myself as being in thorough accord with the argument of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] upon this proposition. The common acceptation of the term "general appropriation bill" is after all that it is a general supply bill such as is necessary for the support and maintenance of one of the great departments of the Government or, as he expressed it, in the case of the urgent deficiency bill a bill meant to appropriate for deficiencies arising in the several departments. That may be well called a general appropriation bill. But, Mr. President, calling attention to another test as to whether or not this is a general or a special appropriation bill, I think that test is largely found in the title first of the general Agricultural appropriation bill, and then of this particular bill now under consideration, and if not in the title it is found in the first paragraph of either of the two bills.

The title of bill H. R. 9054 is "A bill making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," a title common to all department appropriation bills with such necessary changes of phraseology as are appropriate to the several departmental bills. But I take this bill—House bill 11945—and the title of the bill is special. It is to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products." By its title that is not a general appropriation bill in the sense in which that term is generally used and accepted.

But let us see about the purpose of this bill as defined in the first paragraph of the bill. Similarly to the general Agricultural appropriation bill, the first paragraph of the pending bill defines its purpose or object. It says:

> That to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purpose of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

I have before me that act, the purpose of which is to be carried out by this bill, H. R. 11945, and I want to call attention to the purposes of that act as defined in the first paragraph thereof.

> That for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense and carrying on the war with Germany by gathering authoritative information concerning the food supply, by increasing production, by preventing waste of the food supply, by regulating the distribution thereof, and by such other means and methods as are hereinafter provided, the powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are conferred and prescribed.

By the very terms of the bill before us it is special, and it refers to the purpose which this bill is to carry out, a special bill for a special purpose.

Hence, Mr. President, the appropriations provided for in this bill are by no means general appropriations. They are special for the purpose of carrying out these special purposes, the purpose provided for in the act of 1917, and the purposes further as provided for in the act itself.

I do not see how Senators can construe this to be a general appropriation bill within the ordinary acceptation of the term, and I can not help but think that the ordinary meaning and accepted understanding of the term must guide us here in determining whether or not this is a general appropriation bill.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] suggests that I read the first paragraph of the general Agricultural appropriation bill. It is as follows:

> That the following sums be, and they are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, for the purposes and objects hereinafter expressed, namely.

Then come the provisions in the bill relative to the salaries of the general employees in the Department of Agriculture, and then the provisions in regard to the several bureaus and divisions of the department, followed by appropriations respectively necessary for them and their employees. They are all for the operation and carrying on of the business of the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year; without them the department could not exist. It is a bill of this character and not one like the pending bill, which falls within the rule prohibiting an amendment which proposes general legislation.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I intend to vote upon this matter as I voted upon exactly a similar question on March 15. I am very much interested to see whether the Senators who voted on that matter at that time will vote the same way. At that time we were dealing with the labor question. At the present time we are dealing with the prohibition question. On March 15 on a general appropriation bill there was a provision known as the Borland amendment, and it was a limitation upon the use of money in that appropriation. It expressly provided that the appropriation should not become available for the payment of the salaries of employees in the department if the employees did not work at least eight hours. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] offered an amendment providing that they should be paid time and a half for every hour over eight hours. A point of order was made against the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi just as a point of order has been made here upon the ground that it was general legislation.

The Vice President then occupying the chair held that the original provision in the House, introduced by Mr. BORLAND and which became a part of the House bill, was not general legislation because it was a limitation upon the use of the money, and that the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi was general legislation because it was not a limitation upon the use of the money but was a general provision.

The situation here is exactly the same. The provision as it comes from the House provides that the appropriation shall not be used unless prohibition is enforced. It was purely a limitation upon the use of the money as it came to the Senate. The Senate committee amendment is not a limitation at all. It is a direct piece of legislation declaring prohibition, just exactly as the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi providing for time and a half for overtime was a general provision.

The Vice President sustained the point of order in a case that, as I said, is identical with this case. There was an appeal from the decision of the Chair. I want to say that I took the ground then that I take now—that is, that it is absurd to say that something could be accomplished indirectly by a limitation in the House that we could not amend here directly.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. In the case the Senator is talking about now there was not any question, was there, but what the bill to which the amendment was offered was a general appropriation bill?

Mr. PITTMAN. Not the slightest.

Mr. NORRIS. That question was eliminated there, and that question is involved here.

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; but I am not arguing that question. I say the Vice President ruled directly on the point before us today, that you could not add general legislation in this body to an appropriation bill on the excuse that general legislation had been originated in the House when the so-called general legislation consisted solely of a limitation upon the use of the money. The Borland amendment was a limitation upon the use of the money. The Randall amendment in the House was a limitation upon the use of the money. The Williams substitute was not a limitation upon the use of the money, nor is the committee amendment to-day a limitation on the use of the money. Both of them come within exactly the same category.

I voted not to sustain the Vice President in the matter, because I am unwilling, as I said then, to tie the hands of this body to a condition where we have either got to vote for or against some provision of general legislation coming from the House. However, the Vice President was sustained. I desire to read a list of the Senators voting to sustain the Vice President, and after I am through with that I will submit the question.

Mr. McKELLAR. On what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am reading from page 3592, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, March 16. I desire to make a record of this, because it seems to me very unfortunate that constantly these questions are decided apparently not by the law involved but by the sentiment of the respective Senators. I read it to show who voted to sustain the Vice President. Those voting to sustain the Vice President were the following Senators: Messrs. Beckham, Borah, Curtis, Fall, Fletcher, France, Frelinghuysen, Gallinger, Gore, Gronna, Johnson of California, King, Kirby, Knox, McCumber, McKellar, McLean, Martin, Myers, Nelson, New, Nugent, Overman, Phelan, Pomerene, Ransdell, Shields, Smith of Georgia, Smith of Michigan, Smoot, Sterling, Sutherland, Swanson, Thomas, Tillman, Townsend, Wadsworth, Warren, Watson, and Wolcott. Those voting not to sustain the decision of the Chair were: Messrs. Hale, Henderson, Hollis, Jones of Washington, McNary, Pittman, Shafroth, Sheppard, Smith of Arizona, Stone, Thompson, Trammell, Walsh, and Williams.

I intend to vote with regard to this question exactly as I voted before.

Mr. JONES of Washington and Mr. MYERS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield first to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he is sustained in that by the decision of the Senate that I read a while ago, when I think the Senator was not here, on page 9686 of the RECORD, where the Senate sustained the Senator's position by a vote of 37 nays to 13 yeas; that is, 37 voted with the Senator.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator from Nevada argued that to the Senate on the appeal from the decision of the Chair and cited a number of decisions which seemed to the Senator from Nevada to sustain the position then taken by him. I see no reason at the present time to change my view of the matter. Yet this is not the last time this question is coming up. It has come up many times in the past, and it is going to continue to come up. I believe if this body is going to attempt to invoke the principle that there shall be no general legislation upon appropriation bills they should not permit a provision of that kind to come from the House to this body, and if it does come to this body they should vote it out, and not attempt to amend it at all. That is the position I am going to take from now on. I am going to vote against any provision of general legislation coming from the House from now on.

Mr. MYERS. May I make a suggestion to the Senator?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I call the attention of the Senator from Nevada to the fact that in the case which he cited here occurring last March there could be no question about its being a general appropriation bill, while my colleague [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] and a number of other able parliamentarians in the Senate have argued very strongly that this is not a general appropriation bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will say in answer to that that the able argument of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] was not comprehended by me sufficiently to arouse any opposition in my mind.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. I dare say the Senator's mind was concentrated on the other proposition.

Mr. PITTMAN. Very probably.

Mr. WALSH. As I understand the matter the Senator from Nevada does not undertake to express any view upon the other aspect of the case.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have not as yet, and I did not intend at the present moment.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me the two questions are entirely separate. If the Senator from Nevada votes to sustain the appeal upon one ground I vote to sustain the appeal upon the other ground; on both grounds, for that matter.

Mr. PITTMAN. The position taken by the Senator would be immaterial to me in the matter. I take it that this is a general appropriation bill, and I take it that the House having inaugurated this character of legislation we are entitled to proceed with it. That is the view I took before. I take it that the distinction between a general appropriation act and a special act is the difference between an appropriation in the form of special relief and an appropriation generally for the benefit of the country.

This bill expressly on its face states that it is in aid of the Department of Agriculture; that it is for the purpose of carrying out existing law. That is the title of the bill. The very first section of the bill states that the appropriation is essential for the purpose of the department in carrying on its functions under the general law heretofore passed by Congress.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Just one word. In line with what the Senator is now saying, I desire to suggest that the object and purpose of an appropriation bill should not be settled merely by its title, but by the scope of the enactment itself. If there ever was a broader bill than this, one covering more articles and more general legislation as to the Agricultural Department, and which is in exact line with the original Agricultural appropriation bill, I have not seen it. If the bill is examined, it will be found that it is amendatory of general legislation; and it is certainly general legislation if the universality of the objects embraced in it can make a bill general in character.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I have listened to the arguments pro and con on this question with very much interest; but there is one point which I think has not yet been made. The question is whether the supplementary agricultural bill is within the meaning of the rule a general appropriation bill. Inasmuch as it provides for the needs of the entire country, it is general in its scope, and by no construction could it be called a special appropriation bill. Therefore, we must now distinguish by our votes on the appeal whether we believe such a measure is a general appropriation bill within the meaning of the rule; and by our decision we shall make the rule. We shall give it a fixed interpretation. Whatever we now decide becomes a law by precedent; and it is very important, apart from any other consideration, that the Senate take the view—which has always been contended for and which is the reasonable rule—that it is a vicious practice to put upon an appropriation bill carrying sums for the general needs of the Government and the country general legislation related or unrelated to its general purpose, and thereby encouraging the use of such an appropriation bill as a vehicle for carrying legislation of a general character, which otherwise would be opposed.

I want to carry out the objects of the appropriation bill, for instance, because it contains many measures for the common weal, but I can not vote for it without at the same time accepting the nauseous amendment which has been grafted upon it—I use the word in a respectful sense; it is a very expressive word, however—by gentlemen who are interested in prohibition. If they are honest men, why can they not in good faith propose a measure for prohibition, and then you and I, having a clear-cut proposition before us, can vote according to our judgment. Now, we are swayed by our extreme desire to fortify the Agricultural Department in the great work of protecting the agriculture and live stock of the country. Therefore, I say, the rule is for the purpose of discouraging, condemning, and prohibiting such vicious methods; and if we, by our votes to-day in sustaining the Chair, put upon those methods the stigma of our disapproval, it may silence forever those gentlemen who seek methods reprehensible, I claim, for accomplishing their purpose. I appeal to gentlemen who are favorable to prohibition to submit a prohibition measure, and I ask them, and I ask the Senate in sustaining the Chair, not to use general appropriation bills for the purpose of carrying measures which in themselves are entitled to particular and special consideration. I say, then, in conclusion, this is a general appropriation bill because it is not a special appropriation bill. It is general in its terms, and it affects the whole country.

Senators who have spoken have discussed only clause 3 of Rule XVI. Clause 4 of that rule reads:

> No amendment, the object of which is to provide for a private claim, shall be received to any general appropriation bill.

If a private claim were before Congress proposing to compensate a farmer for the loss of sheep, does the Senator from Montana contend that it would be proper or lawful, according to the rule, to put the amendment on this bill which is now under discussion—this supplemental general appropriation bill for the Agricultural Department—to put upon that bill a private claim compensating a farmer for the loss of his sheep, provided the claim is regular and otherwise agreeable?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Mr President, I am very glad to answer the question of the Senator from California. It would be quite inappropriate to do so; it would be very impolitic and unwise to do so. It would be equally unwise to attach a provision of that kind to House bill 11945, which makes an appropriation of $10,000,000, which it proposes to place in the hands of the Bureau of Mines to conduct expensive experiments, investigations, and other things of that kind. It would be equally reprehensible to attach that kind of a private claim to this bill. My judgment is that the rule, however, does not forbid such a provision being attached to either bill.

Mr. PHELAN. That is just the very admission I wished the Senator to make; that this rule for the protection of the Senate against vicious legislation does not prevent what manifestly is a vicious practice of putting a private claim upon a bill of the scope of this bill, which I describe as within the meaning of the rule and within the meaning of sound sense, at any rate, as a general appropriation bill, because it is not special. It is general in its terms and in its scope. Therefore, the point I wish to make is that the Senate shall now make its rule. If the Senate believes in this vicious practice—putting riders which are irrelevant, embodying general legislation, upon appropriation bills—then the Chair should not be sustained; but if the Senate desires to set a precedent—that is, make an interpretation of the rule which will forever bar the introduction of important general legislation as riders upon appropriation bills—then the Chair should be sustained. I shall vote to protect the Senate and sustain the Chair.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, having so recently become a Member of this body, it is with very great diffidence that I venture to discuss any parliamentary question before it. Although I am fairly familiar with the parliamentary practices in the other House, I realize that there is very great difference between the practice in reference to such matters in this body and in the other. However, as I intend to vote to overrule the decision of the Chair, upon the ground that this is not a general appropriation bill within the rule, and because I do not wish that vote to be regarded as assenting to the proposition which has been laid down by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that it is proper to incorporate such an amendment upon a limitation that has been made on the appropriations by the other House, I feel that I ought to say a word upon that question alone.

I confess that I have been very much surprised by the statements which have been made as to the precedents which have been established in the Senate; but, Mr. President, it seems to me there is an elementary principle of parliamentary law that is so clear, namely, that general legislation can not be incorporated upon a limitation imposed by the House, that I think it ought to be discussed for a moment from that standpoint.

Mr. President, it has been stated that the House has opened the door by the limitation that is found in this bill to legislation of this character. That can only be true if the House has legislated upon the subject of prohibition or has legislated upon the use of grains and foodstuffs in the manufacture of liquor. The House in this bill has not legislated upon that subject in any degree or in any respect. It has left the question of prohibition and the use of foodstuffs for liquors, from a parliamentary standpoint, just exactly where it was before the House passed this bill or before it adopted the Randall amendment. From a parliamentary standpoint, it did not attempt in the least degree to interfere with the discretion that Congress in the law already enacted had delegated to the President. It left the President entirely free to issue that proclamation or not.

Then what does the limitation propose to do? Nothing more than to make these appropriations available upon the happening of a contingency; that is all; there is no legislation upon the subject. It simply declares that, in the event the President shall issue the proclamation therein referred to, these appropriations shall be available; otherwise not.

Mr. President, it would have been just as competent for the House to have made a limitation, for instance, that these appropriations should only be available after a treaty of peace concluding the existing war had been signed; but would it be urged that, because that had been made the subject of the contingency, the Agricultural Committee could bring in an amendment to this bill now directing the President with reference to the terms of that treaty of peace and go into the entire subject of how the war shall be concluded? No one could urge that.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes, sir.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like to know what difference there would be, in effect, if the Randall amendment were placed upon every appropriation bill this year, thus preventing the Government from carrying on its business, unless prohibition were provided for, and adopting the amendment which the Senate committee has incorporated in this bill?

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senate should agree to the limitation, of course it would stop the appropriation unless the condition were fulfilled; but the Senate may either agree to the limitation or it may do this—and that is what I am coming to—the Senate may change that limitation in any form that it pleases; it may amend it; but the limitation must be there, because there is no legislation in the limitation as it comes from the House. There being no legislation there, the House has not opened the door for legislation by the Senate contrary to the rule.

Mr. PITTMAN. The object of it is to accomplish prohibition during the war, is it not?

Mr. LENROOT. I presume so, although——

Mr. PITTMAN. And the House expected to accomplish that purpose——

Mr. LENROOT. Perhaps so.

Mr. PITTMAN. And it would accomplish that purpose if the amendment agreed to by the House were placed on every appropriation bill and the Senate were to adopt it?

Mr. LENROOT. Not necessarily; certainly not in this bill. If the Senate agrees to the limitation exactly as it is proposed in the House bill, all that would happen would be that the appropriation made in the bill would not be available unless the President saw fit to issue the proclamation that he has been delegated authority to issue. That is all there is of it.

Mr. PITTMAN. Well, but the House expected that the amendment adopted by them would accomplish the same result as the Senate committee amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true. I do not question that, but from a parliamentary standpoint many things may be done by a parliamentary body that it has a perfect parliamentary right to do, and it may accomplish by indirection an object that could have been accomplished by legislative action; but that has nothing to do with the parliamentary status of the question.

Mr. PITTMAN. In other words, under the method of procedure adopted in the House, something may be accomplished negatively that can not be accomplished affirmatively.

Mr. LENROOT. Let me ask the Senator a question in reply. I gave the illustration a moment ago that the House might have made these appropriations available upon a treaty of peace being concluded by the President; but does the Senator contend that if the House had chosen to make such a limitation it would have been competent for the Agricultural Committee to have brought in legislation with reference to the terms on which the existing war should be concluded and directing the President as to the terms of the treaty of peace?

Mr. PITTMAN. I submit that the Senate would have a right to go further than simply to say that the appropriation shall be available when a treaty of peace is signed. They might go further and say that the money might be available when a treaty of peace was signed with one of the countries; in other words, I mean to say that the absurdity must be apparent of the contention that upon a general appropriation bill essential to provide for the expenses of this Government the House can legislate with regard to any subject, and this body be limited with regard to the same subject. It is absurd on its face.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator, in the illustration he makes, agrees with my contention. He states that it would be competent, in the illustration that I gave, for the Senate to amend that limitation imposed by the House by providing that the appropriation would be available upon the making of a treaty of peace with any single country. I remind the Senator that that would merely be amending the limitation, and it still would be only a limitation. The Senate would have the fullest right and the widest scope to amend this House amendment in any way of limitation that it chose, but it has no right, as I see it, to disregard the limitation and use the limitation as an excuse for legislation when there is in fact no legislation there.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. GORE. Does not the Senator from Wisconsin think that this proviso was purposely and manifestly drawn in the form of a limitation upon the appropriation because the House regarded the bill as an appropriation bill, and a limitation upon an appropriation bill would be in order under the rule and would not be subject to a point of order, whereas general legislation upon an appropriation bill would have been subject to a point of order?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, it is very plain to me that had it not been for that there would have been, instead of a limitation, a legislative provision in the bill. I am satisfied, of course, that the limitation comes to us in this way because of the fact that in the House general legislation would have been held not to have been in order upon this bill.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. PITTMAN. I should like to ask the Senator one further question, merely to make clear his position. If, in his opinion, this is a general appropriation bill, then the Chair should be sustained?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but I do not think it is a general appropriation bill within the rule.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that; but if the Senator did believe it was then he would vote to sustain the Chair?

Mr. LENROOT. If I believed it was a general appropriation bill, I would vote to sustain the Chair. That is my position.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, whether the Senate sustains or overrules the decision of the Chair on this point of order, I think we must all agree that it is a vicious practice to attach general legislation to any appropriation bill. It is vicious whether the bill is a general or a special appropriation bill. The phrase "general appropriation" is used in contradistinction to the words "special appropriation." I recognize how we might have some difficulty at times in trying to determine satisfactorily to ourselves whether a given measure was a general appropriation bill or a special appropriation bill. I have only heard a part of this discussion; I have not heard any Senator say how many items must be in an appropriation bill before it ceases to be special and becomes general legislation. I take it we would have some difficulty in arriving at a conclusion that would satisfy our own minds if we were to attempt to determine it along that line.

In the earlier history of the Senate there was only one appropriation bill. That was a general appropriation bill. Gilfry in his Precedents tells us that the number of appropriation bills increased from one general appropriation bill in the early history of the country to 14 at the present time. Now, if we are to determine what a general appropriation bill is by what was the precedent in the earlier history of the Senate, then we would have to say that every one of the 14 appropriation bills with which we are now familiar is a special appropriation bill.

Note what Mr. Gilfry says:

From one the general appropriation bills have grown to the number of 14, viz, Agricultural, Army, Diplomatic and Consular, District of Columbia, fortifications, general deficiency—

And so forth—not to read the remainder.

So, as the Senate has divided the one bill into 14 for its own convenience, or perhaps because the necessities of the country became such that it was unwise to place all the appropriations in charge of one committee, should the country continue to grow further and the Agricultural Committee in its wisdom should bring in two bills instead of one, by what process of mental gymnastics are we going to say that the one is a general appropriation bill and the other a special appropriation bill?

Now, let us look at this bill for just a moment. There are probably more than a hundred items in it. In the first paragraph we find that the appropriations therein contained are—

For the prevention, control, and eradication of the diseases and pests of live stock.

The second paragraph is:

For procuring, storing, and furnishing seed wheat and beans—

And so forth.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me at that point to call his attention to the fact that the whole second paragraph, to which he is just referring, is practically an amendment to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill?

Mr. POMERENE. I think it is.

Mr. PENROSE. It says so here in the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I am obliged to the Senator for the suggestion. Then follows the third paragraph:

Third. For the prevention, control, and eradication of insects and plant diseases injurious to agriculture, and the conservation and utilization of plant products.

Then there is a subdivision of this subject, and various appropriations are made for each of those subdivisions. Then the fourth paragraph provides:

Fourth. For increasing food production and eliminating waste and promoting conservation of food, including eatable nuts, by educational and demonstrational methods, through county, district, and urban agents and others—

And so forth.

Then another paragraph on page 8:

Fifth. For gathering authoritative information in connection with the demand for, and the production, supply, distribution, and utilization of food, and otherwise carrying out the purposes of section 2 of the act.

And then the sixth paragraph, which is very general:

Sixth. For miscellaneous items, including the salaries of assistant secretaries appointed under the act approved August 10, 1917; special work in crop estimating; aiding agencies in the various States in supplying farm labor; enlarging the informational work of the Department of Agriculture; and printing and distributing emergency leaflets, posters, and other publications requiring quick issue or large editions; for the following stated purposes and in amounts as follows:

Then follow many other items.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] a moment ago referred to the title of the general appropriation bill as bearing out his theory that the bill pending before the Senate now is a special appropriation bill. I have never understood that the title of a bill was controlling as to the subject matter contained in the bill. It may be that it is persuasive, but it is only persuasive. If we refer to the title of the pending bill and shall be guided by it in determining the character of the bill, we must conclude that it is not even an appropriation bill, because nowhere in the title does it even refer to the subject of appropriations.

Let us see what the conclusion is to which we are drawn by the argument of some of our distinguished colleagues this afternoon. We admit that it is a vicious practice to put general legislation upon a general appropriation bill. It is just as vicious to put it upon a special bill. If this is a special appropriation bill, how many items must be added to it in order to make it a general appropriation bill? Certainly the question of prohibition, whatever our views upon it may be, is a general subject; general legislation must control it throughout the country, for it is to be general in its application throughout the country. If it were general legislation, would it come under the jurisdiction of the Agricultural Committee? Why should they have control of this subject matter rather than any other of the many committees of the Senate? Of course if Senators are intent upon having prohibition I can understand why they will vote to overrule the Chair——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. POMERENE. But if it is a question of sustaining the fundamental principles which are the basis of our rules, then I can not understand why they should so vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I should like to suggest to him that Senators who are opposed to prohibition legislation might vote to sustain the Chair.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, that is very true, and a very pertinent reply to make. So far as I am concerned, I shall vote against general prohibition at this time; if it becomes necessary for the conservation of food, I will vote for it; but not until that situation is properly presented.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. REED. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio what his opinion is of Congress upon a matter of this kind taking the attitude exemplified in the amendment the House adopted, and for which the pending amendment is offered as a substitute, or really as a part of it, the motion being to strike out and insert? What is his opinion of Congress taking the position that the President of the United States can not have supplies sufficient to run the Government unless he will issue a certain proclamation, which under the law he has discretion to issue or not to issue? I should like to know what the Senator thinks of using that club, if I may employ the term, upon the President of the United States which the House of Commons of England used on the despots of England, namely, to cut off supplies?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not want to be put in the attitude of criticizing the House or what they have done in that behalf, but I think it must appear to Senators that any appropriation of public funds should be authorized or denied upon its own merits, and no legislation should be contingent up that appropriation, nor should that appropriation be contingent upon any other legislation.

For the reasons which I have very briefly given, I shall vote to sustain the Chair.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I just want to refer for a minute to this charge that is made and reiterated as to the dangerous and vicious practice of putting legislation of a general character upon appropriation bills. It is strange that we never hear very much about this except when a temperance proposition is under consideration.

Mr. PENROSE. And except when it is done by unanimous consent.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, that is all right. It is strange that we get unanimous consent so often for such a vicious practice to be put into operation so frequently. I just want to put in the RECORD and call attention to one bill that we passed just a few days ago upon which there are many, many provisions of general legislation.

Amendment numbered 105; amendment numbered 106; amendment numbered 107, consisting of 4 or 5 pages; amendment numbered 108, consisting of 4 or 5 pages; amendment numbered 110, consisting of 15 pages; amendments numbered 111, 116, 117, 122, and 123, and quite a number of other amendments that I have not had time to look up, are all contained in the military appropriation bill; and, as the Senator from Utah says, there is not an appropriation bill of a general character that passes that does not have on it general legislation of some kind. So that, while this practice may be denounced as vicious, if we did not follow it there would not be very much good legislation enacted by Congress. I do not agree myself with the contention that it is vicious. I think it works out pretty well.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes. I just wanted to call attention to those amendments.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator has alluded to the Army appropriation bill, recently passed, and to the great amount of legislation in it. Most of that is strictly within the rule. It was legislation that had already passed the Senate but had gotten blockaded in the House. If the Senator will look at those amendments, as no doubt he has done, he will see that almost all of that legislation had already passed the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator knows that that does not make it in order on an appropriation bill under our rule. The Senator is too experienced a legislator to contend that.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, read it and see whether it does or not.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well. There is no rule that makes legislation in order because it is reported from a committee. It makes an item of appropriation, or something of that sort, in order; but that is not what I am referring to. I want to say, furthermore, that I did not call attention to this in criticism of the military bill or of the practice, but rather I commend it myself.

I think we have to do that in order to get through good legislation and important legislation and necessary legislation.

Mr. WARREN. Even though that were true, the amendments went in by unanimous consent. They would have been ruled out, of course, had the point of order been raised against any one of them that had not already conformed to the rule because it had previously passed the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator will find that that rule does not apply to general appropriation bills.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Washington that if this custom of putting general legislation upon appropriation bills is a vicious practice, the viciousness of it is greatly mitigated when the legislation is in so righteous a cause as that proposed in this bill. In order to bring about the reform sought by this amendment the Senate can afford to be liberal in its construction of its own rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, as stated by the Chair, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Calder	Gerry	Jones, N. Mex.
Baird	Chamberlain	Gore	Jones, Wash.
Bankhead	Colt	Hale	Kellogg
Beckham	Curtis	Harding	Kendrick
Benet	Fletcher	Henderson	Kenyon
Borah	France	Hitchcock	King
Bandegee	Frelinghuysen	Johnson, Cal.	Knox
Lenroot	Penrose	Smith, Ariz.	Thompson
Lewis	Phelan	Smith, Ga.	Trammell
McKellar	Pittman	Smith, Md.	Underwood
Martin	Pomerene	Smith, Mich.	Vardaman
Myers	Ransdell	Smith, S. C.	Wadsworth
Nelson	Reed	Smoot	Walsh
New	Shafroth	Sterling	Warren
Norris	Sheppard	Sutherland	Watson
Nugent	Sherman	Swanson	Wolcott
Overman	Shields	Thomas

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixy-seven Senators having answered to the roll call, a quorum is present. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered. Those in favor of sustaining the Chair will, when their names are called, vote "yea"; those of contrary mind will vote "nay." The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and vote "nay."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who, I understand, would vote as I shall vote. I therefore feel at liverty to vote on this question. I vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and vote "nay."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when Mr. MCNARY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MCNARY] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "nay." I understand that he is paired with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GUION].

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. As he is not present, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], but I am advised that he would vote on this matter as I shall vote, so I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). I desire the RECORD to show that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. WADSWORTH (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "nay."

Mr. MCKELLAR. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] on official business.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the President pro tempore, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], and to state that if he were present he would not vote on this question, having been in the chair when the point of order was decided.

Mr. LEWIS. I merely wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], occasioned by personal illness, and ask to have this announcement stand for the day. I also wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], who has been called away on official business.

Mr. COLT (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY]. I am at liberty to vote on this amendment, however, and therefore will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY]; and

The Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WILFLEY].

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Baird	Johnson, Cal.	Phelan	Swanson
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Pomerene	Underwood
Calder	Kellogg	Ransdell	Wadsworth
France	King	Reed	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Knox	Simmons	Watson
Gerry	Lewis	Smith, Ariz.	Wolcott
Gore	Martin	Smith, Ga.
Harding	New	Smith, Md.
Hitchcock	Penrose	Smoot

NAYS—36.

Ashurst	Fletcher	Nelson	Shields
Bankhead	Hale	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Beckham	Henderson	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Benet	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Sterling
Borah	Kendrick	Pittman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thompson
Colt	Lenroot	Shafroth	Trammell
Curtis	McKellar	Sheppard	Vardaman
Fernald	Myers	Sherman	Walsh

NOT VOTING—27.

Culberson	Guion	Lodge	Saulsbury
Cummins	Hardwick	McCumber	Thomas
Dillingham	Hollis	McLean	Townsend
Fall	James	McNary	Weeks
Gallinger	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Wilfley
Goff	Kirby	Page	Williams
Gronna	La Follette	Robinson

So the Senate refused to sustain the ruling of the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, do I understand that the question now is on the amendment contained on page 6, line 21?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, beginning on line 11, after the numerals "$6,100,000," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the paragraph, or all down to and including line 20 on page 6, and in lieu thereof to insert the matter proposed by the committee.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, the amendment is the printed amendment offered by the committee. I am entitled to move an amendment now in the second degree, and I move that all reference to wine be stricken out. I suppose that amendment will have precedence. The confusion grows out of the fact that in the printed bill there is an amendment which is not before the body, because the committee, since the printing of the bill, has substituted another amendment; and I therefore move that all reference to wine be stricken out.

I can more particularly describe my amendment by saying that it is made to the amendment proposed by the committee and not contained in the bill reported by the committee. If the Members are all supplied with a copy of the amendment, I am in a position to make a specific motion to strike out the word "fruit," on line 2, page 2, and the word "wine," on line 3, page 2, and the word "vinous," on line 4, page 2. The object of the amendment is to eliminate wine from the prohibition otherwise provided in the amendment, which bars the manufacture of vinous, malt, and spirituous liquors.

The Agricultural Committee was in session and heard testimony, and at one stage of its proceedings I am advised that it decided not to include wine. At a subsequent meeting the committee reported to the Senate that the prohibition of the making of wine should not begin until June 30, 1919. That would give the wine growers of the country an opportunity to take off the crop which is now upon the vines and to dispose of it. The committee, however, continued its sessions and made a third change, and that is the change which is now proposed and which in this language affects wine:

After November 1, 1918—

That is, this year—

until the conclusion of the present war no grain, cereal, fruit, or other food product shall be used in the manufacture or production of beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor for beverage purposes.

That is to say, that after November 1 of this year, 1918, there can be no manufacture or production of wine.

After December 31, 1918, until the conclusion of the present war, no beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquor shall be sold for beverage purposes except for export.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield for a question.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator's amendment prevails, and wine is excluded from the amendment, will the Senator then support the amendment in its amended form?

Mr. PHELAN. If the Senator, representing the committee, can give me any assurance at this time that there is no prospect of eliminating other objectionable features of the amendment, I shall be prepared to answer him; but, to be perfectly frank, I personally am interested, as representing a great wine-producing State, producing 90 per cent of all the wine made in the country, in saving wine from prohibition; and at the same time, believing that light beverages are not harmful but indeed healthful in this emergency, of which there is abundant evidence, I am also in favor of eliminating beer from the terms of prohibition. Therefore I am not prepared to say at this time that the amendment, with the exclusion of wine alone, is entirely acceptable to me. I therefore shall address myself at this time to wine.

I know that the Senator has in mind not only wine, but beer and whisky. I am opposed to the continued manufacture and sale of whisky; and I believe that wine and beer are suffering from their companionship all these years with the whisky interest, which has largely maintained the saloons, to which there is every patriotic objection. Wine is not served over the bars of the soloons in any quantity. It is a table beverage. Wine involves no question of food conservation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California further yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. PHELAN. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that the Senator has answered my question, but there was so much confusion when he first took the floor that I am not certain of it. The question I wanted to ask the Senator was in regard to the present crop of grapes that are to be made into wine. Did the Senator say at the beginning of his remarks that the crop that will mature this summer or fall would be destroyed if this amendment were agreed to?

Mr. PHELAN. I am in a position to answer the Senator very accurately. The State of California maintains an official body known as the California Viticultural Commission, whose officers are paid by the State. Incidentally, I may say there are 12 agricultural stations of viticulture in California, showing the interest of the Federal Government as well as the State government in the maintenance of that industry. I have here, received to-day, a telegram from E. M. Sheehan, secretary of the California State Viticultural Commission. It reads as follows:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., July 9—12.5½ p. m.

Hon. JAMES D. PHELAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

To-day's news finds thousand grape growers and financial institutions in this State appalled at proposed confiscatory national legislation. Crushing and fermentation of grapes for wine usually ceases December 1—

I will repeat that for the benefit of the Senator from Nebraska—

Crushing and fermentation of grapes for wine usually ceases December 1; distillation and fortifying to complete manufacture sweet wine is a continuous process, often running into spring months of the following year, and it is a part of process of manufacture of this wine. If manufacture of wine is prohibited November 1—

Which this amendment provides—and the sale prohibited January 1—

As this amendment provides—grape growers of California will lose the coming crop, which I estimate, at present market prices for wine grapes, to be worth $14,000,000 to the growers.

To the growers, not to the middlemen nor to the jobbers, but to the growers—

No wine makers would buy grapes or manufacture wine the coming vintage season if time of sale were limited to January 1. The bulk of wine would not be fit for marketing at that time. Hurried meeting called by wire for Thursday this week in San Francisco. Please wire me last-minute advice and impressions, that I may submit them.

E. M. SHEEHAN, Secretary.

That is to say, the wine growers are holding a meeting to-morrow and wish to be advised of their fate. There is no question at all that if the committee amendment prevails, it is simple confiscation of the crop now upon the vines.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from California yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. GORE. If the Senator is about to conclude his remarks in a few moments, I will not move to adjourn. Otherwise, if it is agreeable to the Senator, I should like, at the request of a number of Senators, to move an adjournment at this point.

Mr. PHELAN. It is quite agreeable to me to acquiesce in the chairman's view.

Mr. GORE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, July 11, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 11, 1918.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee in our pursuit of truth. We would know not only the relative values but the ultimate principles of the relations of men to the governments which men have set up. All Thy lovers are lovers of truth. We pray that we may be kept straight and true in our pursuit, that no present good, that no tempting future power, may lure us from the path in which Thou wouldst lead us to establish among men a government founded upon the ultimate principles of the Gospel of Thy Son. Hear us in our prayers this day and guide us. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. VARDAMAN and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Henderson	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Hitchcock	Nugent	Smith, Mich.
Benet	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Smoot
Brandegee	Kellogg	Phelan	Sterling
Calder	Kendrick	Pittman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Poindexter	Swanson
Colt	King	Pomerene	Thomas
Culberson	Knox	Ransdell	Thompson
Curtis	Lenroot	Reed	Trammell
Fernald	Lewis	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Fletcher	McCumber	Shafroth	Walsh
France	McKellar	Sheppard	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Martin	Sherman	Watson
Gore	Myers	Shields	Wolcott
Hale	Nelson	Simmons
Harding	New	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I wish to announce that my colleague, the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], is absent on account of illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4444) to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12100) to amend the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. Res. 313) providing for the disposition of moneys represented in the Alfred Bernard Nobel peace prize, awarded in 1906, and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have received a telegram from about 300 operators, employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., at Detroit, in the nature of a protest against Government control of telegraph and telephone lines. These men say that they are experienced in their profession and loyal citizens and believe they can render more efficient service to the Government under private ownership than under public ownership.

I ordinarily would ask to have this telegram printed with the names attached to it, but I shall not do that this morning. I merely refer to the matter, because I regard it as important, and ask that the telegram be referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The telegram will lie on the table.

The Chair will state that he has received through the Vice President's office numerous telegrams addressed to the Vice President as presiding officer of the Senate regarding the subject matter referred to by the Senator from Michigan. It has been the custom of the Vice President to hand such telegrams or petitions to the Senators from the respective States from which they come. In this case the telegrams are from a large number of people now in convention in Chicago, employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. The Chair, not being able to determine to whom they should go, will hand the telegrams or protests against the passage of the proposed legislation to the Secretary of the Senate for proper disposition.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Chair will indulge me for a moment, a communication like that coming to the presiding officer of the Senate, addressed to the Senate, it seems to me rises to a high privilege, and those telegrams and petitions should be received formally and printed in full in the RECORD. We must safeguard the right of petition, the right of petition made directly to the Senate, and unless the Chair entirely disagrees with the propriety of it I should like to suggest that the telegrams which he hands down may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona objects.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I shall not pursue the matter any further, except to say that if the constitutional right of petition means anything at all it means that the Senate and the House of Representatives will receive and hear communications addressed to us by individual citizens and organizations in the Republic.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not believe they can be set aside fairly.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the request of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I have two telegrams coming from an association of citizens and a builders' exchange, which, to my mind, are in the form of petitions, and I ask to have them read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read the telegrams.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What was the request of the Senator from Minnesota?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks to have two telegrams he presents concerning building operations, I think he said, read.

Mr. KELLOGG. No; telegrams from a building association and a citizens' association, on the pending wire-control joint resolution, which I ask may be read.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I object.

Mr. KELLOGG. If the telegrams are returned to me, I will read them myself.

Mr. PENROSE. If the Senator will permit me, the right of a hearing has been denied by the majority. I hardly think they want to deny the right of petition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the matter should be submitted to a vote of the Senate as to whether the telegrams shall be read or not.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. There is so much confusion I could not understand what the motion is.

Mr. KELLOGG. One of the telegrams is from the president of the Citizens' Alliance of Minneapolis and the other from the president of the Minneapolis Builders' Exchange, protesting against the enactment of this legislation. If the people of this country have any right guaranteed by the Constitution, it is the right of petition to the Senate. The committee has denied the right of a hearing, and I wish to get these telegrams before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the Senator will refer them to the Committee on Printing and proceed according to the regular order, it will be carried out, as other petitions where the request is made to print must be dealt with.

Mr. KELLOGG. I move that the telegrams be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the telegrams presented by him be read by the Secretary.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, is that a debatable proposition?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is proceeding in the morning hour, and the Chair has never had any ruling on it. The Chair will have to consult the rule and will be glad to know what is the idea of the Senator from Idaho on the subject.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have had a great deal of sympathy with the Senator from Arizona in his objections to printing indiscriminately everything in the RECORD that is offered, and I still sympathize with that view. I do not believe that we ought to break down this rule. In any event, we certainly ought to make a definite rule and have a definite understanding and apply it persistently and continuously to all alike. Just a few days ago we voted overwhelmingly to sustain the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will say to the Senator that he has refreshed his mind on the rule and that the question must be submitted to the Senate without debate. So the Chair can answer the question of the Senator from Idaho at once that debate is not in order.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Chair please state the question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Rule XI provides expressly for submitting the question without debate. The question is, Shall the telegrams be read?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, before the question is put I wish in explanation to the Senate to say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question, the Chair will say, is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I am not debating the question. I am asking unanimous consent to make a statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arizona requests unanimous consent to make a statement before the vote is taken.

Mr. PENROSE. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been called for upon the motion. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. As he is absent, I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and will vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to state that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] to the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. KENDRICK (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence on official business of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

Mr. FERNALD. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GUION];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY];

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH];

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. LEWIS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness; that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] is detained by illness in his family; and that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is necessarily absent.

The result was announced—yeas 41, nays 27, as follows:

So Mr. KELLOGG's motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the telegrams.

The telegrams were read, as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., July 10, 1918.

Hon. FRANK B. KELLOGG,
Washington, D. C.:

The Minneapolis Builders' Exchange look with apprehension and misgiving on Western Union situation as now before you. We are convinced that no serious strike impends and that the best interests of the country demand that the Government do not take over the telegraph lines.

W. I. GRAY, President.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., July 10, 1918.

Senator F. B. KELLOGG,
Washington, D. C.:

At a meeting of the executive board it was unanimously and vigorously decided that the industrial situation in the United States to-day makes it imperative that the Western Union Telegraph matter be let alone by Congress. Yielding to the influences that are agitating and demanding Government control spells disaster. On behalf of the best interests in this community I urge you to resist this effort to the greatest extent possible.

O. P. BRIGGS,
President Citizens' Alliance of Minneapolis.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am not going to ask that a number of telegrams and resolutions which I received yesterday and last night indorsing the bone-dry amendment be published in the RECORD, but I desire to state to the Senate that I have received such communications, which are to me an expression of the popular sentiment in my State on this particular question. If it were necessary, I should ask that they be printed in the RECORD, but this is all I desire to say in reference to them at this time. I think, however, it is very proper to publish such petitions in the RECORD, because I think the people have a right to be heard by petition or by their representatives on the floor of Congress.

Mr. MYERS. I present a telegram from a committee representing 604 citizens of Valley County, Mont., petitioning for the immediate enactment of nation-wide prohibition as a needed war measure. I ask that the telegram be appropriately referred.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The telegram will lie on the table.

Mr. PENROSE. I have here a telegram in the nature of a petition, from Clifford Prettyman, delegate from Philadelphia, Pa., representing the employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., comprising New England and the North Atlantic States, respectfully requesting a hearing on the joint resolution relating to telegraph and telephone control. I have wired this gentleman that it is the purpose of the majority in the Senate to force the joint resolution through this body without hearing or consideration, so that I know that there is no use in pressing his request; but, out of deference to the communication, I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. PENROSE. I also have a similar communication signed by a large number of employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. in Louisville, Ky., to a similar effect, to which I have sent a similar answer, and I make the request that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have a telegram, in the nature of a memorial, from Edgar C. Dodge, chairman, and J. A. Morrison, secretary, of 1,500 employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., of Chicago, Ill., protesting against the taking over of the telegraph company of which they are the employees; also protesting against certain foreign labor agitators, and asking for a hearing of the employees. I do not ask that this telegram be read, but I do ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The telegram referred to is as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., July 10, 1918.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Fifteen hundred employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., by petition, yesterday elected me chairman to act as their spokesman to acquaint Congress of their sentiment with reference to the reported attempt by certain foreign labor agitators to bring about a strike among the patriotic employees, and, at their request, I forwarded a telegram to Senator SMITH, chairman of the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee, voicing their sentiments, and respectfully requested that we be allowed to send a representative to appear before the committee. Great disappointment prevails among the employees this morning over the action of the committee in returning the bill to the Senate body without hearing their testimony. Is there not some way whereby the employees may be given a hearing on a question so vitally affecting the welfare of the country? I have been requested by the 104 employees who wired you last Saturday to advise you of their appreciation of the recognition you gave their petition.

J. A. MORRISON, Secretary.
EDGAR C. DODGE, Chairman.

Mr. POMERENE. I have a telegram from the telegraph operators of Columbus, Ohio, to which there are probably 50 or 75 signatures. They respectfully ask that a representative of the employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. be permitted to appear before the Interstate Commerce Committee.

I also have another telegram, signed by T. E. Ragsdale, chairman, on behalf of 700 employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, craving permission to appear before the Interstate Commerce Committee for the purpose of presenting their side of this question. I shall not ask that these telegrams be incorporated in the RECORD, but I ask that they be respectfully referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. WALSH. At the city of Helena, Mont., the capital of the State, which I have the honor in part to represent, there is located a relay office of the Western Union Telegraph Co., and for that reason an unusually large number of employees are engaged at work in the office. I have from them a telegram protesting against the measure now pending to take over the telegraph lines, and saying that they will join no strike. In that connection they also say:

No red-blooded American would go out on a strike at this critical stage of the war, and we call ourselves that class of Americans.

I ask that the telegram be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, in this connection I ask unanimous consent, as this seems to have become the rule and order of the day, to have printed in to-day's issue of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the law as to printing telegrams, and so forth, and also the report of the Committee on Printing of the Sixty-fifth Congress, Report No. 49, for the edification and enlightenment of Senators, if not as an appeal to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Arizona will be complied with, and the matter will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Senate resolution 77.

Resolved, That only a brief statement of the contents, as provided for in Rule VII, paragraph 5, of such communications as are presented under the order of business "Presentation of petitions and memorials" shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and that no other portion of such communications shall be inserted in the RECORD unless specifically so ordered by vote of the Senate, as provided for in Rule XXIX, paragraph 1; except that communications from the legislatures or conventions, lawfully called, of the respective States, Territories, and insular possessions shall be printed in full in the RECORD whenever presented, and the original copies of such communications shall be retained in the files of the Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Printing, to which the President of the Senate, on April 20 and 28, 1917, referred certain letters, telegrams, and resolutions received by him, for determination as to whether they shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as petitions and memorials, submits the following report in regard thereto:

The committee has given consideration to the constantly increasing number of letters, telegrams, resolutions, and other communications addressed to individual Senators that have been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as petitions and memorials. This practice is taking up more and more of the time of the Senate during the morning hour and has greatly increased the bulk of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at a very considerable expense to the Government. In view of the repeated discussions in the Senate as to whether such communications ought to be presented as "petitions and memorials" under that order of morning business, the committee desires to call attention to the following rules and precedents of the Senate covering this subject:

Paragraph 5 of Rule VII provides:

"Every petition and memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist and have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, and shall be presented and referred without debate."

Paragraph 1 of Rule XXIX provides, omitting the portions not germane to this discussion, that—

"Every motion to print * * * memorials, petitions, accompanying documents, or any other paper, except * * * communications from legislatures or conventions, lawfully called, of the respective States * * * shall, unless the Senate otherwise order, be referred to the Committee on Printing."

In the Forty-ninth Congress the Senate adopted the following order, which is printed as a footnote to the standing rules of the Senate (p. 11):

"Ordered, That when petitions and memorials are ordered printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the order shall be deemed to apply to the body of the petition only, and the names attached to said petition or memorial shall not be printed unless specifically ordered by the Senate."

In the interpretation of the foregoing rules these precedents have been established by the Senate:

On July 16, 1850, the presiding officer of the Senate held that a Senator could not present resolutions or memorials addressed to himself or his colleague. They must be addressed to the Senate or to the Congress. (Hinds' Precedents, vol. 4, p. 269.)

On December 13, 1865, the Senate, by vote, decided that a telegraphic communication addressed to the members of a congressional delegation should not be read as a memorial to Congress.

On February 25, 1868, the Senate again decided, by vote, that a letter addressed to a congressional delegation should not be received and read. Mr. Hendricks, in objecting to the reception of the letter, stated that it was not in order on account of being addressed to the delegation from the State of Michigan and upon a matter not before the Senate for legislation.

On January 8, 1873, resolutions of a board of trade addressed to a Senator and not to the Senate were objected to for the reason that it was a private communication to a Senator and not addressed to the Senate. The paper was thereupon withdrawn by the Senator who had presented it.

On April 4, 1894, the Vice President [Mr. Stevenson] sustained a point of order "that during the call for petitions and memorials under Rule XII, paragraph 4, which prescribes that every petition and memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or the memorialist, and have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, and shall be presented and referred without debate," it was not in order to read the petition at length, either by the Senator presenting it or by the Secretary, unless by unanimous consent. (Gilfry's Precedents, p. 466.)

On June 17, 1913, the Vice President [Mr. MARSHALL] in sustaining an objection to the reading of a petition stated, "The Chair finds that there is a precedent in the ruling of Vice President Stevenson in 1894 to the effect that"—and then, after quoting the ruling referred to above, added—"As the Chair has a high regard for Vice President Stevenson, the same ruling will be made now."

It appears, therefore, that the subject is already well covered by the rules and precedents of the Senate, but that, as stated by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in discussing the rule relating to the presentation of petitions and memorials, on April 29, 1914:

"It is, however, a rule which has been utterly disregarded for many years. Under the head of 'petitions and memorials,' letters of all kinds and telegrams of all sorts have been freely read from the desk, attacking everybody, everywhere, and with various observations attached to them. The Senate has fallen into the way of permitting that."

With a view to establishing a definite and uniform practice in regard to the printing of communications in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as petitions and memorials, your committee submits the following recommendations:

"That only a brief statement of the contents, as provided for in Rule VII, paragraph 5, of such communications as are presented under the order of business 'presentation of petitions and memorials' shall be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; and that no other portion of such communications shall be inserted in the RECORD unless specifically so ordered by vote of the Senate, as provided for in Rule XXIX, paragraph 1, except that communications from the legislatures or conventions, lawfully called, of the respective States, Territories, and insular possessions shall be printed in full in the RECORD whenever presented; and the original copies of such communications shall be retained in the files of the Secretary of the Senate."

In accordance with the foregoing recommendations the committee further recommends that the following disposition be made of the petitions and memorials referred to it on April 20 and 28, 1917:

That the concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii as transmitted by the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Territory of Hawaii under date of April 5, 1917, be printed in full in the RECORD as part of the Senate proceedings.

That the following petitions and memorials be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations without printing:

Memorial of the General Memorial Day Committee of Minneapolis, approving the President's address of April 2, 1917.

Memorial of the mayor, city counselor, and aldermen of the city of Annapolis, Md., approving the action of the President and of Congress in declaring that a state of war exists between Germany and the United States.

Memorial of the Japanese-American Citizens' Association of Honolulu, Hawaii, indorsing the policy of the President, and declaring readiness to perform their duty as American citizens.

Memorial of the Telephone Society of Denver, Chapter No. 1, of the Mountain States Telephone & Telegraph Co., pledging support to the President and approving his address of April 2, 1917.

Memorial of the United States Brewers' Association placing itself at the service of the President and pledging unqualified support.

Memorial of the American Saddle Horse Breeders' Association in annual meeting at Louisville, Ky., commending the action of the President and of Congress in declaring war against Germany and pledging support.

Memorial of the Joint Labor Legislative Board of Illinois indorsing action of the Washington labor conference in pledging loyalty and support to the Government in the war with Germany.

Memorial of the people of Hartford, Conn., in public meeting tendering loyal and devotion and pledging all their material and spiritual resources to the successful issue of the war.

That the following petitions and memorials be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs without printing:

Memorial of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor against conscription.

Petition of Alan McVeigh, of New York, favoring the universal training and conscription bills.

Petition of the Swarthmore (Pa.) monthly meeting of the Society of Friends praying exemption in the conscription bill.

Petition of the State Council of the District of Columbia, Daughters of America, praying for passage of the Chamberlain compulsory military training bill.

Petition of the executive board of the Twentieth Century Club of Washington, D. C., favoring the selective-draft bill.

Petition of the Pennsylvania Society of the War of 1812 urging the passage of the conscription, universal military training, and compulsory service bills.

Telegram of the Turpentine & Rosin Producers' Association, signed by L. N. Dantler, president, of New Orleans, favoring the selective-draft bill.

Memorial of the Medical Association of Georgia approving national preparedness.

Memorial of the Riding Club of New York City favoring universal military service.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of sundry citizens of Wyoming, favoring the enactment of further prohibition legislation as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have a number of telegrams with reference to the telegraph situation, some from men who say they have been discharged because they have union cards, and others insisting that they never intended to strike, but desired to support the company. I will file them with the Secretary and let them be noted under the rule.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia presented telegrams from Atlanta Council No. 60, Commercial Telegraphers of America; from sundry employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., of Atlanta; from sundry employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., of Savannah; from A. W. Carter, secretary, of Atlanta, all in the State of Georgia; and from A. W. Reynolds, of Atlanta, Ga., and W. A. League, of Richmond, Va., representing the Western Union employees of the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Kentucky, and Tennessee, in convention assembled in Chicago, Ill., relative to the telegraph situation, which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

PORT OF ENTRY AT OSWEGO, N. Y.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 8839) for the establishment of Oswego, in the State of New York, as a port of entry for immediate transportation, without appraisement, of dutiable merchandise, and I submit a report (No. 550) thereon. It is a unanimous report from the committee, and I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORT OF ENTRY AT BAR HARBOR, ME.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 12002) for the establishment of Bar Harbor, in the State of Maine, as a port of entry and delivery for the immediate transportation, without appraisement, of dutiable merchandise, and I submit a report (No. 549) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill by title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, has the bill been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been read by title. Does the Senator desire that the bill be read in full?

Mr. REED. I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the first and seventh sections of the act approved June 10, 1880, as amended, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement, be, and are hereby, extended to the port of Bar Harbor, in the district of Portland, in the State of Maine.

Mr. REED. Does the bill provide for the establishment of a new port of entry?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator that this bill is recommended by the Treasury Department. It is simply designed to expedite business going through that port and to save the people inconvenience.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wish to call attention to the fact that a number of years ago, in an effort to get rid of several ports which were nonproductive, Congress gave the President authority to abolish such ports as he saw fit. The President made an order abolishing a large number of ports. Among other ports that were abolished was that at Kansas City. There never has been any man able to give a good reason for the abolition of that great port, because its business was sufficient to warrant its continuance, and the cost of maintaining the port was very small in comparison with the cost of maintenance of a majority of the ports which were allowed to continue. Now, if we are going to reestablish new ports of entry, I wish to include the port of Kansas City. If we are going to stand rigidly upon the rule as it has been heretofore made, I do not care to raise the point; but if we are going to begin in this way I want that port, which is a large port and does an enormous business, restored. I have no hesitancy in saying, without knowing about the port mentioned in this bill specifically, that the business there is probably not one-tenth of the business of Kansas City. What is the port referred to?

Mr. CALDER. The port of Bar Harbor, Me.

Mr. REED. I have no desire to oppose Bar Harbor being made a port of entry, if it is necessary. What committee has this bill been before?

Mr. CALDER. The Committee on Commerce; and it has been unanimously reported by that committee.

Mr. REED. What is the amount of business done at Bar Harbor?

Mr. CALDER. I do not know the amount. I understand this bill will permit goods to be entered at that port. It does not provide for a customhouse and does not mean a single dollar of additional expense to the Government.

Mr. REED. How can goods be entered without a customhouse?

Mr. CALDER. Under this measure goods are shipped to the port of destination through Bar Harbor and examined at the port of destination by the officers at the customhouse located there.

Mr. REED. I am not going to object to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. REED. I understand that the bill establishes Bar Harbor as a port of entry and delivery. I am going to inquire, before this bill passes, how can it be a port of entry without customs officials being there?

Mr. CALDER. If the Secretary will read the letter from the Treasury Department, I think it will clear up the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 31, 1918.

Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KITCHIN: The department is in receipt of your letter of the 10th instant inclosing a bill (H. R. 12002) to make Bar Harbor, Me., a port of entry and delivery for the shipment and receipt of merchandise under immediate transportation entry without examination and appraisement and requesting such suggestions as may be deemed appropriate regarding the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage.

The department has recently received advice from the collector of customs at Portland, Me., that the making of Bar Harbor a port of delivery under the seventh section of the act of June 10, 1880, would facilitate the importation of merchandise by the residents of Bar Harbor and would also serve to prevent the wrongful delivery of merchandise shipped to Bar Harbor and the consequent imposition of fines upon the bonded carriers.

As a commercial necessity appears to exist which warrants the same, I recommend that the bill in question be enacted into a law.

Very truly, yours,

L. S. ROWE, Acting Secretary.

Mr. REED. Is Bar Harbor, Me., anything but a summer resort?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, Bar Harbor is a town of between three and four thousand inhabitants. Of course, in the summer there are a great many more people there. I know nothing in particular about this bill; I never heard of it before it came up for consideration a few minutes ago, so I can not give any information about it; but it was recommended by the department, I take it, upon the basis of the facts before it.

Mr. CALDER. I may say in connection with the customhouse at that point that Portland is the customs district, and there is located there a deputy collector of customs, as I understand, who passes upon all goods coming in. My information is that the passage of this bill will not mean any additional cost to the Government, but will simply expedite the business coming into that port.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there was taken away from Kansas City, Mo., the customhouse that did the business for Kansas City, Mo., and Kansas City, Kans., two towns containing an aggregate population of not less than 400,000 people, and also doing the business for a large territory which embraced the city of St. Joseph, with 125,000 people. It does seem to me that if large cities of that kind are to be deprived of a customhouse and of the advantages of a port of entry, we ought not to be asking them for a city of three or four thousand people. That does not seem to me to be the right thing. I should like to know some special reason for the enactment of this bill.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Missouri whether Kansas City is not now a port of entry. They may have taken away the customhouse, but is it not now a port of entry?

Mr. REED. It is a subport.

Mr. HALE. That is all that is being asked for Bar Harbor.

Mr. REED. It is attached to St. Louis, and every controversy of importance which arises has to be settled in the city of St. Louis. If any dispute arises, or any showing has to be made, our merchants are obliged to cross the State to St. Louis, 300 miles away.

Mr. HALE. That is all that we are asking for Bar Harbor—what the Senator already has in Kansas City.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CALDER. Unanimous consent has been given, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate by unanimous consent. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I think these bills have been going to the Finance Committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I rose to say.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The general policy as to where ports of entry should be made, how the revenues should be collected, and so forth, belongs to the Finance Committee, and I should regret to see a bill passed in conflict with the general policy that has been adopted.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the enactment of this bill is urged by the Treasury Department, and it is a very little thing to do. It expedites the business of the people of Bar Harbor. It will not cost the Government a dollar, as I understand; and it is something we have been doing right along for years, whenever asked for it by the Treasury Department.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, undoubtedly the jurisdiction of the subject matter of this bill is in the Finance Committee. Ever since I have been a member of that committee it has been handling these bills. Now and then, I think, some of them have been referred by inadvertence to the Committee on Commerce. I have not myself felt justified in making any protest where that was done. If I have been in the Chamber when it was proposed to be done, I have, if cognizant of the subject matter of the bill, objected.

As this matter has been before the Commerce Committee, and they have acted upon it, I do not feel justified in asking for its recommittal; but I wish to serve notice that hereafter I shall insist that these bills be sent to the Finance Committee.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the pending bill, together with the one that was just passed, was referred to the Committee on Commerce. There was no contest at all over the matter. The committee acted upon the advice of the department; and I can not base an objection, upon the statement made by the department, to the enactment of this bill at this time. I do not know the custom heretofore with reference to the committee to which such legislation is referred, but there was no contest over that matter in the Commerce Committee this morning.

Mr. REED. Was this bill just turned out this morning?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes, sir; it was just turned out this morning, and a similar bill has just been passed by the Senate for Oswego, N. Y.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, of course there was no contest in the committee this morning. There was nobody there to make it, I suspect.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There was a pretty full attendance at the meeting of the committee. There was a quorum. The Senator from Missouri is a member of the committee.

Mr. REED. The committee was called together at a time when five or six other committees were meeting. I am a member of that committee. I was not there, because I had to be in attendance on the Military Affairs Committee, where there was a hearing. It is easy enough to slip these things through.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. REED. Nobody has yet given us a reason for the passage of this bill. Some assistant down in the office of the Secretary of the Treasury says it is deemed advisable to put this man there—to have a port of entry there. He does not give us any reason why it is deemed advisable. We simply have the ipse dixit of this subordinate in the Treasury Department.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I want to say that it is always regrettable to the members of the Commerce Committee when the Senator from Missouri is not present; but there was no reason assigned, no fact stated, why the bill should not be favorably reported. I can not imagine that anybody had such an interest in the bill as to try to slip it through, as the Senator has said. I know nothing about it myself, except the report made on it by the department.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator a question. The Committee on Commerce was called together this morning. To-day was not the regular day for the Commerce Committee to meet, was it? Did it do any business except reporting these two bills?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Oh, we had a good deal of business. We had a hearing this morning, and a very interesting meeting; and I am sorry the Senator from Missouri was not there.

Mr. REED. I received my notice in the morning mail, entirely too late to make any arrangement to attend the committee. I simply think, if we are going to begin this sort of business, that we should begin it all along the line. If we are going to take care of the villages, let us take care of the cities.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will say to the Senator that, so far as I am personally concerned, I should be very glad to support a bill that would reestablish the office at Kansas City, if it is needed; but the neglect of Kansas City does not in any way drive one to the conclusion that this legislation is not needed.

Mr. REED. The Senator is proceeding, of course, upon that letter, which gives no reason. Can the Senator tell us what the commerce is at Bar Harbor?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I have not the remotest idea.

Mr. REED. The Senator does not know whether there would be enough receipts there as a total to pay the salary of the man in charge?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not; no, sir. As I stated to the Senator a moment ago, I acted upon the letter from the department. I have no personal knowledge whatever of the subject except the information given in letters from the department.

Mr. REED. I think the bill ought to be laid over for a day.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I simply want to say to the Senate that I am a member of the committee, and joined in this report, but I did it under the impression that the bill did not involve any extra expense to the Government. If I had known that it did, I should not have joined in a favorable report without further investigation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think, as a rule, the establishment of these interior ports does not increase the expense to the Government of handling this foreign merchandise.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; it does.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the policy of the Treasury Department has been only to indorse or recommend the establishment of these ports where they find that it will not only facilitate business transactions but will probably lessen the cost to the Government of handling the commerce. I understand, however, that there has grown up in the interior, in a great many sections, a large demand for raw materials that are brought here from other countries; and in the ordinary course that merchandise would be warehoused at the port of entry, and have to be sent from there to the interior point. The purpose is to permit its immediate removal upon arrival in this country without this intermediate process, in the interest of expedition, in the interest of accommodating the industry to be supplied with the raw materials, and also in the interest of economy in handling.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, these ports of entry are established in a great many cities in the United States. The goods can not be delivered at these ports of entry to the merchants within the city at which the port is located until they are examined, and there always is an appraiser appointed, and he collects the amount of duty upon the goods and reports to the Treasury Department the amount collected; and if the amount of goods shipped to said ports is so great he can not appraise the goods himself, he has to have an assistant.

Now, we have such a port at Salt Lake City. An appraiser is appointed; he has his clerk, and the expenses are paid by the Government. At that city the amount of duty collected is more than the expense of maintaining the office; but I want to say that there are some ports of entry in small cities where the amount of money collected does not pay the expenses of the port. If the Senator accepts an amendment to this bill providing that no expense shall be incurred by the Government, his bill will not amount to anything, because you have got to have an appraiser to appraise the merchandise at the port before it can be delivered to the merchants, and the appraiser has to collect the amount of the duty imposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill having been read three times, the question is, Shall it pass?

On a division, the bill was passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

A bill was introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LENROOT:

A bill (S. 4823) to provide increased revenue; to the Committee on Finance.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. MARTIN, and by unanimous consent, it was Ordered, That Senator BENET be assigned to the chairmanship of the Committee on National Banks and to membership on the following named committees:

Appropriations.
Cuban Relations.
Expenditures in the Navy Department.
Five Civilized Tribes of Indians.
Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.
Private Land Claims.
Transportation and Sale of Meat Products.

DEATH OF MAJ. JOHN PURROY MITCHEL.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I wish to occupy the time of the Senate for about three or four minutes this morning.

I know that it is not ordinarily the custom to pronounce in the Senate a eulogy on anyone other than a Member of the Senate or of the House of Representatives, but the fact that in the city of New York to-day ceremonies are being held as a final tribute to the life and works of the former mayor of that city, who, as a patriotic American and a brave soldier, has just laid down his life for his country, prompts me, in this body, to say that for a man of his years no one has done more to elevate the standard of municipal government in America than did John Purroy Mitchel. As assistant corporation counsel, as commissioner of accounts, as president of the board of aldermen, and then as mayor he shed luster on every place he filled.

He was defeated for reelection in November of last year, not because he did not give the city the best government that it ever had but for the reason that in his advocacy of some reforms the people, through misapprehension of his intentions, did not fully conceive his purpose. His record in the office will be a model for future mayors to follow.

At the expiration of his term as mayor he immediately tendered his services to his country. They were accepted, and he was commissioned as major in the Aviation Corps and died in that service. Maj. Mitchel came from a race that has fought for liberty for generations. To-day in that greatest of cities in this world he will be laid away. The city that gave him birth, whose affairs he administered so ably, mourns his loss. The Nation has lost the services of a real patriot and a brave soldier. His example is an inspiration to the youth of his city and to the Nation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business, morning business is closed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 8th instant, approved and signed the act (S. 3929) for the construction of a private conduit across Michigan Avenue NE., in the District of Columbia.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House joint resolution 309.

Mr. CURTIS. Is it the purpose to displace by this motion the emergency Agricultural bill?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. We are proceeding in the morning hour, and that being the unfinished business I propose to proceed with this joint resolution.

Mr. CURTIS. Until 2 o'clock?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. My idea is to proceed with the joint resolution, if the Senate is willing.

Mr. GORE. I wish to say that I had risen and attempted to address the Chair. I concede that the Senator from South Carolina received recognition, but my purpose, I wish to say to the Senator from Kansas, was to ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate. I suppose at 2 o'clock it will be laid before the Senate, and the two propositions will then have a contest for ascendancy.

Mr. CURTIS. I just wanted to know what the intention of the chairman was.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The intent of "the Senator from South Carolina" is, if possible, to keep the joint resolution before the Senate until it is disposed of, and I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from South Carolina.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask the Senator from South Carolina if he understands this resolution is to give the President authority to take over all telephone lines?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The joint resolution, of course, speaks for itself. It is simply to enable him to take over all if, in his judgment, he thinks it for the benefit of the country in time of war and for war purposes, and also it authorizes him in reference to marine cables, telegraph, or radio systems to do the same thing.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator from Michigan permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. In a matter of this importance it seems to me that the joint resolution should be read. It has not been read to the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have no objection in the world to having the joint resolution read.

Mr. PENROSE. I supposed the chairman of the committee, having refused hearings, would not decline to permit the Senate to have the joint resolution read.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have no objection to the joint resolution being read. The fact is, it is so simple in its terms it can be readily understood.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask that the joint resolution be read.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I asked a question of the Senator from South Carolina with reference to taking possession of all telephone lines, because I can hardly see how that is a military necessity, and much confusion would result from such action throughout the country. There is a great deal of competition in that field, and I have wondered if it was the intention of the framers of this measure to authorize the President to take all these lines over. Of course, if he takes over a part of the lines under the joint resolution—for instance, if he took over the Bell Telephone lines in my State and by any process of reasoning should increase the wages of the Bell Telephone operators, it would at once impose a responsibility upon the Citizens' Telephone Co. of the State to do likewise or enter a field of competition which would be both destructive and dangerous. The question of tolls and rental and hours of service is very important to the telephone patrons, and any unnecessary interference with present plans should have the most careful consideration.

There have been times, Mr. President, when I have not been averse to taking over the telegraph system, using it as an assistance to the Post Office Department and with a view to cheaper rates, but our experience with Government railroad operations has shattered my hopes in this regard and leaves me in grave doubt about the wisdom of our course; but it seems to me we are drifting into an unknown and an untried field. So far as I am concerned, and I say it deliberately, I have taken my last step in favor of socialism or the public control of private enterprises; I have sustained the President at every point since war was declared. He has not said this was a material necessity. I am sick and tired of the drifting process.

I believe we are drifting away from sound principles and constitutional government, and when we undertake to dispossess, even temporarily, the owners of private property, who are managing it in the interest of the people as well as their own interest, it seems to me that unless it is absolutely necessary as a war measure, it is a very dangerous experiment for us to undergo.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that he ask the chairman what the intention is about taking over the telephone lines. I do not, as a member of the committee, have any knowledge of it whatever. I have had no means of knowing. We have had no hearings and no discussion on the subject.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator desires I will be very glad to have him state it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The attitude of the committee was that the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy made this request in regard to the telephone and telegraph and radio systems of the country, which are the eyes and ears of the Nation, perhaps of more vital importance than or of equal importance, so far as the war is concerned, to the railroads and transportation system. The fact of the business is that we all recognize that the whole system of commerce and military operations is predicated upon the ability of quick and efficient communication. These are done by the electric devices known as the telegraph and telephone and the radio system.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will say to the Senator that as far as the radio system is concerned the Government has amply protected itself. It has fixed a wave length which is not permissible to anyone else to use. They have an absolute monopoly when it comes to certain wave-length wireless communications. That was taken care of by the Committee on Commerce and the Congress at the time the wireless operations were undertaken, and the Overman Act gives all necessary power to the President in protecting telegraph communications.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Michigan will allow me, that is an argument, it seems to me, for the extension of like power to the telegraph and telephone.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like to ask the Senator——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am just wondering whether the people will have a right to breathe unregulated by law if we continue to supervise their daily life.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not think they will if Germany is victorious. For that reason we are trying to protect against it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Well, Mr. President, Germany will not be victorious, and in destroying her we must be quite sure we do not destroy ourselves. It is not necessary to make war upon our own cherished institutions in order to overthrow European autocracy. But we are being inhibited at every point. So far as I am concerned, I voted for the food law with the fuel provision, with a reservation in my heart that I was not voting right; that confusion and disorder would result from mismanagement. We made it possible for Mr. Garfield to make a blunder in the administration of the coal office when we bestowed the power, and the people have paid the penalty, and it even promises to be worse the coming winter than in the last. It is now quite beyond our reach.

Are we now to turn over all methods of communication to novices and strangers? Are we to subject to criticism and censorship every telegram that goes over the wires? Are the Associated Press and the United Press and all the newspapers of the country to be inhibited from using the wire except by the permission of the Postmaster General? If that is true, then indeed we have fallen upon very unfortunate times.

The whole tendency of this movement is in the direction of socialism and was born of artful ambition and a desire to rule, and, as far as I am concerned, I am through with it. I have supported the President ungrudgingly, and shall continue to do so. He has never said this was a military necessity, and I do not believe it to be sound economics. I have gone as far as I think prudence and judgment will dictate.

When the Senator says we have been requested to do this by the Commander in Chief, I should like to know the method of communication. He has not asked Congress to do it. He has not spoken with those upon this side of the Chamber. If he has communicated with the Senator from South Carolina he must have done it yesterday, for I understand the Senator was absent the day before.

As far as I am concerned, I am through experimenting at public expense; we have gone far enough. There is no necessity for this measure. When you say that a farmer shall not call up his market man unless he has the permission of Mr. Burleson you are going too far. Yet e are very apt to be met with exactly that situation. To raise the wages of the Bell Telephone employees is to force the independent telephone companies to do the same, although it will bankrupt them to do so and destroy this popular medium of communication through meddlesomeness and higher tolls. There is no law now for increasing railroad fares, and yet 40 per cent has been arbitrarily added to the rate formerly enjoyed. It is an expensive experiment and can be carried too far.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Excuse me. I do not wish to be discourteous to the Senator from Illinois. I cheerfully yield to him for a question.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan interests me in the statement that he makes. It is contrary to what I understood was the situation by law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BANKHEAD in the chair). Both Senators will suspend. The reading of the joint resolution has been called for. There is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I think it was called for in my time.

Mr. PENROSE. Perhaps the Senator could address himself better to the matter before the Senate if the joint resolution was read.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not care to take more time; indeed, had no thought of entering into the debate when I rose. I am appalled at the ease with which we seem to drift into indefensible positions, and feel very sure it could only be possible at a time like this when we are all anxious to aid the Government in the great task before it. It seems to me, however, in our zeal that we may still cherish the ideals which have made us great and that there may still be left of our form of government a few individual rights and privileges so necessary to the maintenance of our institutions.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator having yielded to me, I say this: I did not know there was any censorship by the Postmaster General under our law of local mail. I have understood there is no such law and that there was no such censorship. I am not aware that the Postmaster General has attempted to exercise it. I should like to know. Therefore, as there is no law for censorship on the mail, I can hardly assume a censorship on wire messages, and if the eminent Senator can cite me to any law authorizing such I would like to know and to have him mention the instances.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, Mr. President, even Russia, disorganized as she is, would not pass a law permitting a postmaster general to read letters passing between citizens. I should hope we had not yet come to such a pass; but that it has been done by an assumed right has been asserted over and over again. I do not know that it has ever arisen in my own case, but I have heard men say that it has arisen in their experience. What I am protesting against is the idea of the Government loading itself down unnecessarily with enterprises which can be better managed by private enterprise. There was no great necessity for taking over the railroads as a military necessity, and yet we yielded. I went along reluctantly, as others did. I have voted many times against my judgment since the war broke out. I do not know that I seriously regret having done so, except in one or two instances; but it seems to me that we are accumulating difficulties inch by inch and step by step, each one going a little farther in the dark. So far as I am concerned I am not a socialist in theory or practice. I shall not take one step more in the direction of socialism to please anyone. I do not believe it is helpful to the American people or wise for our Government. It is dangerous, full of misgivings, tending to dull the edge of individual initiative and make it more difficult for men to meet the hard problems that confront them in our industrial, commercial, and agricultural life.

I am sorry this matter has come up at all. I do not know anything about how people may feel over this question. I am not watching the political weather vane from any angle. I am simply protesting against further drifting away from the cardinal and fundamental principles of government that have made our country the envy of the world, and made it possible for us to be of substantial assistance to other nations when their institutions were threatened; our country is great because of the latitude allowed individual citizens, because of the encouragement which our institutions have always given to honest endeavor; we should forge no shackles for ourselves and guard with jealous care the sacred privileges of citizenship; our institutions must not be weakened or undermined in our zeal to meet the new responsibilities growing out of the war.

I do not doubt but that the Government ought to have the right to send such wireless messages around the world as may be necessary. I do not doubt but that the wires ought to be cleared for the important dispatches by the Government. That is done now, and no complaint has been made. Great vigilance must be shown to safeguard the avenues of communication; such power now resides in the Chief Magistrate. Who can reasonably ask more?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to have the joint resolution read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President during the continuance of the present war is authorized and empowered, whenever he shall deem it necessary for the national security or defense, to supervise or to take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, which supervision, possession, control, or operation shall not extend beyond the date of the proclamation by the President of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty of peace: Provided, That just compensation shall be made for such supervision, possession, control, or operation, to be determined by the President; and if the amount thereof, so determined by the President, is unsatisfactory to the person entitled to receive the same, such person shall be paid 75 per cent of the amount so determined by the President and shall be entitled to sue the United States to recover such further sum as, added to said 75 per cent, will make up such amount as will be just compensation therefor, in the manner provided for by section 24, paragraph 20, and section 145 of the Judicial Code: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed to amend, repeal, impair, or affect existing laws or powers of the States in relation to taxation or the lawful police regulations of the several States, except wherein such laws, powers, or regulations may affect the transmission of Government communications, or the issue of stocks and bonds by such system or systems.

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Alabama yield to me for just a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. I desire to serve notice that I shall offer two amendments to the joint resolution, and I desire now to offer them and have them pending.

The first amendment I offer is on page 1, after the word "telegraph," at the end of line 6, to strike out the word "telephone," at the beginning of line 7; and the second amendment is, in line 8, after the word "thereof," to insert "except any telegraph or telephone lines owned, controlled, or operated by a press bureau or press association."

SHORT-LINE RAILROADS—VETO MESSAGE (S. DOC. NO. 267).

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I understand that there is a veto message at the desk, which has been received and I ask that it be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a veto message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before that is done, I desire to suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Baird	Gore	New	Shields
Bankhead	Hale	Norris	Smith, Ariz.
Beckham	Henderson	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Benet	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Smoot
Borah	Jones, Wash.	Penrose	Sterling
Brandegee	Kellogg	Phelan	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kendrick	Pittman	Swanson
Colt	Kenyon	Pomerene	Trammell
Curtis	King	Ransdell	Underwood
Fernald	Lenroot	Reed	Vardaman
Fletcher	Lewis	Saulsbury	Wadsworth
France	McKellar	Shafroth	Warren
Frelinghuysen	Myers	Sheppard	Watson

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Secretary will read the veto message of the President of the United States.

The Secretary read the message, as follows:

To the Senate:

I regret to be obliged to return without my signature Senate Joint Resolution 159, "to extend the time within which the President may relinquish control of any railroad or system of transportation, as provided in section fourteen of an Act entitled 'An Act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes,' approved March twenty-first, nineteen hundred and eighteen, to January first, nineteen hundred and nineteen."

I do so because I very respectfully but very earnestly dissent from the policy which it embodies. Under its terms the Government would be obliged to assume the control and administration of all short-line railroads without discrimination. I respectfully submit that this is not in the public interest. There are terminal short lines at many centers of freight shipment and some seventeen hundred short lines which were built and are controlled by manufacturing, mining, lumbering and other companies and which are operated merely for the convenience of those companies, which would be included under the language of this Resolution, very few of which it seems to me, if any, ought to be taken over and administered by the Government.

The remaining short roads are feeders to the main trunk lines, and more than mere feeders most of them, for they have in most instances played a very important part in building up the industries of the communities through which they run and have become essential to the prosperity of hundreds of towns and neighborhoods all over the Union. I quite agree that practically all of these should be retained and that they should not only be retained, but that they should be accorded a fair division of joint rates,—a fairer division than some of them have been accorded hitherto,—an equitable allotment of cars and motive power, and fair routing arrangements. Some of them constitute connecting links between two or more trunk-line systems. Those which play this part in the system of railways ought to be accorded as full a share in through shipments as is consistent with the general interests of the shipper and the public.

This is the policy which the Railroad Administration will pursue towards these roads. They will not be put at an unfair or ruinous disadvantage. The Government owes a recognized obligation to the communities which they serve, but it is not in my judgment wise to oblige the Government to deal in the same way with all of them regardless of the very great variety of circumstances which affect their facilities and their administration. I beg that the Congress will leave the Government free to enter into arrangements with them which will in each case be to the interest alike of the road dealt with and of the local public.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 11 July, 1918.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I move that the veto message and joint resolution lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, such will be the order.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, allow me to ask the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, Should not the message be referred to that committee for consideration in order that we may take it up and perhaps present some report with respect to it?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Of course we can not add to or subtract from the veto message. It has got to be voted on as it comes to us, and it has got to be voted on without debate. My idea in moving that the message lie on the table was that at the proper time it could be called up and disposed of. Meantime each Senator will thoroughly acquaint himself with the contents of the message. I do not know any good purpose which could be served by referring the message to our committee. It was for that reason that I did not ask that it be referred.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, I made the suggestion I did for this reason: The joint resolution which is here vetoed was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, was considered by that committee, was reported by it to the Senate, and was passed by the Senate. We now have before us the views of the President with regard to this proposed legislation. According to the view as expressed, the committee was not in harmony with the President. It therefore seems to me that this message ought to be referred to the committee and let the committee consider what ought to be done in the premises.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, when in the first instance the joint resolution went to the committee we had some power to shape it and put it into the form we desired, but now we are absolutely powerless; we can not change a word. We know the contents of the joint resolution, and all that we could do as a committee would be to recommend that it should be passed over the President's veto or that it should not be so passed. I do not know what weight such a recommendation might have; but as to the contents of the measure, it has got to remain as it is; and I do not see what good purpose could be served by sending the veto message to the committee when we can not do a thing with it and when it is necessary for us even when we come to vote on it to do so without debate.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am quite well aware that we must either vote to pass this measure over the veto of the President or not to pass it over the veto; but it is a matter of a good deal of importance, I take it. I was not in harmony with a majority of the committee on the question of the wisdom of passing this joint resolution, but I think that, under all the circumstances, the committee might deliberate upon this question somewhat and might come to a conclusion to make a recommendation to the Senate. That is my purpose, and therefore I move as a substitute that the message be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio moves that the message be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina will state his point of order.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Is it in order to refer the message after the order has been made that it lie on the table?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the Senator from South Carolina is mistaken as to the parliamentary situation. The Chair does not understand that any order has been made that it lie on the table. That motion has been made.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The motion was made to have it lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina moved that that be done, but that has not yet been decided.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have no objection to having the motion of the Senator from Ohio put.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to inquire whether the committee will probably act when the reference has been made to it or whether it will default?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has no means of determining that question.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am in hearty accord with the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. I do not believe that this subject should be dropped here. I do not think that the matter should be disposed of either by passing the joint resolution, notwithstanding the veto of the President, or by failing to do so. That there are short-line railroads in this country which ought to be dealt with there can be no doubt. Recently a very large number have been returned to their owners. I am informed——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will state his point of order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand the motion before the Senate is to lay the veto message on the table. Is that debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not the question before the Senate. The question before the Senate is the motion to refer the veto message to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I can probably relieve the anxiety of the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. As I understand the situation, the Senator from South Carolina moved to lay the veto message of the President on the table, and that is the question before the Senate at the present time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been moved, as a substitute for the motion of the Senator from South Carolina, that the message be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. And that is before the Senate and is debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is before the Senate and is debatable. The Senator from New Mexico will proceed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am informed that the branch of the Government which has in charge the duty of considering the advisability of keeping the short-line railroads under the control of the Government is desirous of doing that with some of the roads which have been surrendered to their owners because satisfactory arrangements could not be made before the 1st of July. Something must be done, it seems to me, to give the Government power now to review its previous action and make proper contracts with roads where it was not possible or practicable to do that before the 1st of July, and I simply wish to express the hope that the joint resolution will go to the committee, and that some practical legislation may result.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the veto message of the President of the United States be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask for information whether it is customary to refer vetoes of the Executive to committees. The Constitution provides what the proceedings shall be, and I will ask the Secretary to read the constitutional provision from the bottom of page 191 of the Manual.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Section 7, subsection 2, of the Constitution, found on page 191 of the Manual, is as follows:

> Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States; if he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal and proceed to reconsider it. If after such reconsideration two-thirds of that House shall agree to pass the bill, it shall be sent, together with the objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two-thirds of that House it shall become a law. But in all such cases the votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and nays, and the names of the persons voting for and against the bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House, respectively. If any bill shall not be returned by the President within 10 days—

And so forth.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is sufficient, Mr. President.

I am not at all seeking to take any part in the discussion as to whether or not this veto message should be referred to the committee. I do not know what should be done, and I am not sufficiently familiar with the proceedings upon veto messages to advise the Chair or the Senate, but I am asking for information. My impression had been—of course, vetoes are not very frequent—that when a veto message came in, whether it was a bill or a joint resolution, it either lay on the table or was acted upon immediately by the House to which it came. If it were laid upon the table it could be taken up and either passed over the President's veto or not; but I did not know that it was customary to refer a veto message to a committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I think his position is absolutely correct, especially in view of the line, beginning on page 191, which says:

> If he approves he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal and proceed to reconsider it.

Which intimates that it is for the body to act upon. It is to remain here. It is not subject to those customs and regulations that preceded it in the form of a bill or a joint resolution. I do not know, as the Senator from Connecticut says, what has been the custom, but it seems to me the clear inference from that is that it shall remain here until it is disposed of.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I am not sure that the constitutional provision would require immediate consideration of it; but I agree with the Senator from South Carolina, as far as I have been able to look at it at all or to think about it, that it does not involve going back to the committee-hearing stage; but it is for the two Houses, on a roll call here, to pass it over the veto or not, without the intervention of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That it shall remain here until we do proceed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. But, as I say, I express that opinion only tentatively.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the President's message be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey will state his point of order.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Under Rule XXII, a motion to lay on the table takes precedence of all other motions.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, let me correct the Senator. My request was—it should not have been placed in the form of a motion—that the message lie on the table until such time as the Senate is ready to consider it; not the formal motion of laying it on the table, as we ordinarily understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the way the Chair understood the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I heard the Senator from South Carolina, and I understood him to move that the veto message lie on the table.

Mr. OVERMAN. Let us vote.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I fail to see what the committee could possibly do with the veto message. If the message were referred to the committee, it would have no jurisdiction to do anything except talk about it, and that we can do here. It seems to me it is a useless thing to refer it to the committee. It is possible that the general expression in the Constitution "and proceed to reconsider it" might allow the message to go to the committee, but I can not see what that would accomplish. It seems to me it would simply amount to postponing action on it, which can be accomplished by having it lie on the table.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, may I make just one suggestion? If a committee is entitled to the possession of a veto message, the committee might keep the veto message indefinitely and deny the Senate the privilege of voting on it at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion, and so holds, that this veto message must either be voted on or must lie on the table until called up for action.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Chair allow me to refer him to section 3550 of Hinds' Precedents? I read:

A motion to refer a vetoed bill, either with or without the message, has been held allowable within the constitutional mandate that the House "shall proceed to reconsider."

Not only have vetoed bills been referred to committees, but in practice those committees have often neglected to report.

A vetoed bill when laid on the table is still highly privileged, and thus justifies a motion to take it from the table and action thereon by majority vote.

It is the first paragraph to which I wish to call the attention of the Presiding Officer of the Senate:

A motion to refer a vetoed bill, either with or without the message, has been held allowable within the constitutional mandate that the House "shall proceed to reconsider."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has ruled on this qusetion. If the Senator from Ohio desires to take an appeal, he can do so.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, no; I will not do that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be printed and lie on the table until called up by the chairman of the committee having charge of it. The Senator from Alabama is recognized.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, as a member of the committee that has charge of the pending joint resolution I desire to make a short statement, giving the reasons why I voted to report the joint resolution to the Senate.

I want to say, first, that of all the joint resolutions which have come before the Senate to take private property for public use, I think the joint resolution that has been presented and sent here by the House is the best drafted joint resolution that has been presented to the Senate. It is simple and to the point and covers the ground.

This joint resolution may be misunderstood by some. I must say that I did not understand the purport of the joint resolution until I had examined into it. It authorizes the President to take over the wire lines of the country during the continuance of the war. Therefore, the President's authority is limited to the war period. It does not propose that the Congress shall take affirmative action on this subject—that is, determine the question as to whether or not there is a necessity existing to-day for taking over these lines. It leaves that question entirely in the discretion of the President. It does not determine what lines shall be taken over and what lines shall be exempted. It gives to the Executive the unlimited discretion to take any lines that in his judgment the present war emergencies may require for the national security or defense. Then it proposes a plan for the payment for this property, or its rental, in the event that the property is taken over by the President.

The provision in reference to the payment for this property has been passed on by the Senate and approved probably a dozen times during this session of Congress. The provision for taking over the property as embraced in this measure has met with little opposition from the business interests, has been thoroughly approved by the Government, and I have heard of no serious difficulties arising under it. The one exception to the adoption of this clause for the taking over of property is the railroad bill, and I know that the clause in that case did bring about a great deal of contention and a great deal of difficulty. More than that, there were two gentlemen who appeared before the Committee on Interstate Commerce, both of them representing great interests that are involved in this joint resolution—one, the president of the Western Union Co., and the other a distinguished lawyer, a former Member of the House of Representatives, and the legal representative of the association of independent telephone companies in this country—and both of them expressed to the committee the view that, if their properties were to be taken over, they were entirely satisfied with the machinery in this bill for taking them over.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I was unavoidably detained from the committee meeting. I should like to ask the Senator whether their testimony was reduced to writing.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The testimony of Mr. Carlton, the president of the Western Union Co., was reduced to writing. The testimony of Mr. Stevens, who represented the independent companies, was not reduced to writing, because Mr. Stevens called merely to inquire if there was going to be a general hearing. He was asked whether he had anything to say upon the subject, or any objection to the terms of the joint resolution, and he said he did not; that he did not see the necessity for taking over the independent companies, but understood that that was left to the discretion of the President; and he did not push the point that he desired a hearing. I asked him, however, whether the clause for taking over the property was satisfactory, and he said it was; that the House had adopted such amendments as they desired in reference to the form of taking over, and that that language was entirely satisfactory to him.

Mr. WATSON. Has the testimony of the president of the Western Union Co. been printed?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not tell the Senator whether it has been printed or not. I do not know. It was taken down. Whether it has been printed or not I can not say.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, let me say in reply to that, if the Senator will allow me, that it was taken down; and I want to state just here, if the Senator will allow me, the circumstances under which the statement was taken down.

Mr. Carlton came in and asked the chairman of the committee if he might be heard. The matter was taken before the committee and the agreement was that he should come in and make any statement that he saw fit to make. We were in session, and a stenographer, who was not accustomed to taking public hearings, was brought in, and Mr. Carlton's statement was taken down stenographically and a typewritten copy made and forwarded immediately—yesterday—to Mr. Carlton himself for such corrections as appeared to him necessary. The balance of the manuscript was then submitted to those members who participated in the hearing. Of course it was more or less imperfect, but the gist of what was said is incorporated in the transcript.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. If the Senator from Alabama will permit me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Alabama yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I really will ask my friends not to get into a controversy in my time, as I want to yield the floor; but if it is for a question I yield.

Mr. WATSON. All I want is to ask a question. That is, I read in the papers that these hearings were behind closed doors. I should like to ask if that is true, and whether or not the reporters were present, or anybody else was present except the members of the committee and the witness.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Frankly, no one had any idea when we met of closing the doors or of excluding anyone. There is a double door at the committee room, which the Senator, being a member of the committee, knows creates confusion in opening and shutting. The secretary, thinking at first that we were in executive session, had closed that door, and was going to exclude all outsiders; and when we started the session we did not say openly and emphatically that the sessions were open. There was some misunderstanding, and I understood that one or two newspaper men came to the door and the secretary told them that we were in executive session. There was no intent to exclude anyone. It was purely a misunderstanding. There was no star-chamber procedure about it. What we did we did openly and aboveboard.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator or to ask him any question now, but in fairness to the Senate it ought to be said that the transcript of Mr. Carlton's testimony is very inaccurate and not at all complete, and no one could read it and know what Mr. Carlton testified to. I simply make that statement. It is no fault of the stenographer. She was unused to taking testimony. The committee should have called for the regular stenographers, but refused to do it.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me a moment——

Mr. KELLOGG. One moment, if the Senator will allow me to complete the statement. I simply make this statement because Senators may wish to read the transcript, and until it is corrected it gives no accurate idea of Mr. Carlton's testimony.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In justice to the committee and to the stenographer that we employed I want to state that it has been the custom of this committee and of other committees where I have had charge of hearings that no matter who the stenographer may be, the transcript is submitted to the person giving the testimony before it is ever submitted to this body or officially recognized.

Mr. KELLOGG. That is true; but the regular stenographers that the committee employed were refused.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I further thrust myself into the remarks of the Senator from Alabama by asking him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be very glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. WATSON. Do I understand, then, that the testimony of Mr. Carlton is to be printed and furnished to Senators?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will state to the Senator that really I do not know. As far as I was personally concerned I saw no occasion for taking any testimony. I do not think there is any occasion now. There is nothing to take testimony about. There was testimony taken, and it was taken down by a stenographer, and I think the transcript is being corrected by the gentleman who gave the testimony, and when it gets back I have no doubt it will be printed and Senators can read it. There was testimony in the House. Certain Cabinet officers and others gave testimony that is printed and obtainable at the desk down here, if anybody wants it.

Mr. WATSON. But the fact is, then, that the only testimony taken by the Senate committee will not be printed for Members of the Senate before the joint resolution can be acted upon.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do no know when the joint resolution will be disposed of. As far as I am concerned myself I do not care to debate very much the bill, but if I can proceed I will be glad to give my views as to why I do not think it is necessary for any testimony to be taken in the matter at all.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I want to say this, since the question has been raised in regard to Mr. Carlton's testimony in view of the fact that it has not been printed: Mr. Carlton suggested in his testimony that he thought a better plan than the one provided in the resolution could be worked out for adjusting the differences between the Government and the company, and he indicated it might require 20 or 25 years' litigation growing out of this transaction.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 11945) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense, for stimulating agriculture, and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products."

Mr. GORE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, of course without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it is temporarily laid aside. The Senator from Alabama will proceed.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. I wish to ask the Senator from Alabama before he goes any further if there is any official executive or administrative suggestion of an emergency requiring this legislation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator from Ohio that so far as I know there is no emergency which exists in this hour for this legislation. That is the reason why I did not think there were any hearings necessary. There were hearings in the House. I think at least two members of the Cabinet appeared before the House committee and stated their reasons why the legislation should be passed. There is a communication to the leader of this side of the Chamber and to individual members of the Interstate Commerce Committee from the President urging the necessity of the passage of the joint resolution, but so far as I know there is no evidence to show that it is necessary to immediately put the bill into operation. Therefore I do not think there is any reason for any testimony to be taken, and that is what I want to lead up to when I once get the floor; not that I am referring to my friend from Ohio, but when I get the floor to make my statement I desire to state the reason why I do not think it is necessary to take testimony, and why I think it is necessary to give the President a power which the Senator from Ohio is just as able to judge of as any witness who might come before the committee.

Mr. HARDING. Then I will ask the Senator from Alabama in the course of his remarks to say whether or not the Cabinet officers urging the adoption of this resolution did not proclaim that they were more concerned about the permanent policy of the Government than they were in meeting an emergency.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I believe they did refer to that in their testimony, but that is not a matter which concerns me. As far as my own individual position is concerned, I have never favored permanent Government ownership of private corporations. I am willing to turn over private corporations to the Government to meet the exigencies of the war that is being carried on to-day, but if I was willing to vote for Government ownership of a private utility the first thing on the list that I would vote for would be the telegraph lines of the country, because I really think that the Government probably made a great mistake when it once owned the telegraph line between here and Baltimore and sold it to private parties instead of making it a part of the post-office system of the country, as the Constitution contemplated that the means of communication between the citizens of this country and the business interests of the country should remain in the Post Office Department and be placed in a central post-office department. The telegraph at that time being unknown, I think within the spirit of the Constitution if not in the letter, you could well place the telegraph lines of this country in the keeping of the Government. But I am not prepared to advocate any such proposition at this time, and want it distinctly understood that I do not do so.

Strip this proposition of all outside questions and it resolves itself down to a very simple proposition that each Member of the Senate is just as able to decide for himself without testimony as if he had the testimony of 100 witnesses.

As I said, there was no objection expressed by the two men who came before the committee, men representing the largest interest involved in this bill as to the machinery provided in the bill for the payment of their property in the event it was taken over.

Now, as to what the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] said a minute ago in reference to the president of the Western Union Co., saying there might be a better way to take over the property, he did express a view of that kind, but when asked as to whether he had any objection to the machinery provided in the bill for paying for his property he said he had not, and so did the representatives of the independent telephone lines. So I take it, when you have the representatives of the two great interests affected by the bill stating that the machinery for the payment of the property is satisfactory and when we have adopted this same machinery probably a dozen times heretofore to take over ships, proving grounds, houses, and hundreds of other questions invading the homes of this country and using this same machinery, it goes without saying that the committee were warranted in reporting that machinery back to the Senate without taking the time to go into a long consideration to show that the method provided for the payment of the property was a correct method which had the sanction of the Senate repeatedly on this subject.

The balance of the bill is limited to a very few lines when you lay aside the question how it shall be paid for if the President takes it over. It merely reads:

> That the President during the continuance of the present war is authorized and empowered, whenever he shall deem it necessary for the national security or defense, to supervise or to take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same.

That is all there is in it, when the President, during the continuance of the war, shall deem it necessary for the national security and defense, not when we shall deem it necessary.

Now, the President has stated that he thinks this bill necessary as a war emergency; that it is necessary for him to be given the power given in this bill.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the Senator will let me finish the sentence, I will yield to him. That is all that is involved in the bill. There is nothing else involved in the bill. There is not a Senator in this Chamber who is asked to express his opinion as to whether he thinks it is necessary at this time or at some time in the future to take over the telegraph companies, but the question you are asked to vote on is the question as to whether or not you are willing to leave it to the Executive of this land in his discretion to take them over if a war necessity arises in the future. That is all there is in the bill. I yield to the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. STERLING. I just wondered whether the Senator from Alabama would venture an opinion himself as to whether the President would, under the authority conferred, take over the telegraph and telephone lines right away.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that I have had no communication whatever with the President. The only information that I have with reference to the matter, so far as the President is concerned, is two letters that I happen to have read that were written to other Senators, in which he simply stated that he thought it was necessary to pass this legislation at this time empowering him, if he thought it necessary in the future, to act in this matter. Now, I will say to the Senator, as far as I am concerned——

Mr. STERLING. But I did understand the Senator a while ago that he, the Senator, did not know of any existing emergency which required the taking over of the lines.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I repeat that statement. I ask the Senator, does he know of any?

Mr. STERLING. I do not know of any, I am free to say; but I will further say to the Senator that I think the testimony given by Cabinet officials before the House committee did not disclose any necessity that would justify the taking over of the lines now as a war emergency.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there is any dispute on that point. The committee does not present this bill to the Senate with the viewpoint that there is any necessity in this hour confronting the country as a reason why these lines should be taken over. If this case were to be tried out on the position that there was an existing necessity, that there was some reason why the Government must take them over at this time, and the Senate were asked to act in the affirmative on the question, your committee would have given elaborate hearings and consideration. But there is no such proposal in this bill. It was written in the House of Representatives. It is not asked that we pass on it for that reason. It is not laid to existing necessities now, but we are contemplating a recess of Congress. The question may lie in the future, and the President of the United States has asked the discretion to do this thing if the occasion arises when the country's defense may need such action.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just one minute. The only question that confronts the Senate of the United States under this bill is just one thing: Will you allow the Chief Executive to exercise his discretion in the interest of carrying on this war if he thinks it is proper, or will you deny it? That is all there is in the joint resolution.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question right there? I think the Senator placed the issue very clearly when he said that the question was not whether we thought there was an emergency which would require it, but whether we would delegate to the President the right to take possession when he deemed it was necessary.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is what the bill says and all it does.

Mr. McCUMBER. The question in my mind, then, is this: Whose function is it to determine that thing? Admitting that upon the field of battle the commander always has authority to take possession of anything that he may deem necessary to further his military purpose, the fact that we must pass our judgment in granting this authority to the President presupposes that he has not the authority now; and, therefore, should we not exercise our judgment? Should it not be a question whether we deem it necessary, rather than a question whether at some future period the President may deem it necessary?

Now, I want to say in explanation, so that the Senator will understand it, that I voted with the Senator to give the power to the President to take possession of our factories and munition plants because I deemed that it was necessary that he should have that power. Here I am asked to vote to give him the power when we have no evidence whether it is necessary or whether it is not necessary. If we are to exercise our judgment, should we not have some evidence upon the subject that will guide our judgment?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am going to assume, for the sake of my argument, that there is no evidence that any necessity exists now; but assuming, for the purpose of my argument, that a condition may arise in the future when this should be done, I think that is the determining question. Now, so far as the Senator and the Committee on Interstate Commerce are concerned, this bill came before the Committee on Interstate Commerce with the past action of the Senate in reference to such bills before us; and, although I can not recall the individual vote of my friend from North Dakota, I assume that he voted as I did, and I think he probably did. If my assumption is wrong, I hope he will correct me. In August, 1916, the Senator and I voted for an appropriation bill that carried a clause in it which was not given any great consideration, authorizing the President, in case of a war emergency, to take over all the railroads of the country that were necessary to move troops or freight. Under that clause, subsequently, the President did take over all the railroads. That question was before the Senate and was passed here without dissent. Without dissent the Senate was committed to it. We did not ask the President to furnish us with facts to demonstrate that it was necessary then to take over the railroads. No; we said: If in your discretion you find it necessary for war purposes in the future, you may exercise the discretion to take over the railroads. Your Committee on Interstate Commerce had the action of the Senate on that subject before it as a precedent.

Mr. McCUMBER. We acted on our judgment in that matter rather than on the mere suggestion of the President.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just let me call the attention of the Senator to a few other precedents that the Senate has established for the passage of this bill. When the time came that the President asked Congress to give him control of the food products of this country, did he ask the Congress to determine when the business interests relating to food should be taken over? No; he asked for the discretion in his judgment as to when it should be taken over and how far it should go, and the Senate of the United States granted that. When it came down to the fuel question, again the President did not ask us to decide whether there was an emergency existing at the time to take over the fuel of the country. No; he asked the Congress of the United States to give him the right in his discretion to take over the fuel supplies of the United States, and the House and the Senate assented. There are a number of other instances. I can give you another instance that goes further than that. When war was declared and the Executive of this land asked Congress to draft the men into the Army between the ages of 21 and 31, he did not say that he needed 10,000,000 men within that age to go into the Army at that time. He did not say that an Army of 10,000,000 men was needed. He did not say to the Senate or produce any evidence that we needed all the men within that draft age to make up the Army. No; he merely asked for that reservoir and asked for the discretion to adopt rules and regulations as to what men should be called from their homes, how many should be called, and when they should be called, and the House and the Senate of the United States assented to that proposition. Now, what have you done? In the past you have granted to the Chief Executive of this country the right to control the fuel supply of the country, not in the discretion of Congress, not when the Congress thought it was necessary, but in the discretion of the Chief Executive. You have authorized in the past the Chief Executive to control the food supply that goes into the mouths of this country, not when you determined it was necessary, but when in his discretion he thought the necessity arose. You gave him in his discretion the right to take over the entire transportation system of this country, not when you thought the occasion had arisen to take it over, but when in his discretion he determined that the necessity arose in carrying on the war successfully. Now, that is the precedent of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. WATSON. But is it not a fact, I will ask the Senator from Alabama, that in every instance he has cited there was at the time of the passage of the act an immediate confronting emergency?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think there was any more confronting emergency then than there is now. Certainly when the act was passed in March, 1918, authorizing the President of the United States to take over the railroads of this country there was not the emergency then confronting the country which confronts it to-day.

Mr. WATSON. No; not the country generally.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On the question of taking over the railroads the situation that confronted us is the situation in reference to these wires to-day.

Mr. WATSON. But the Senator said a moment ago that in his judgment there was no emergency for taking over these lines at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I mean by that, as I explained, that there is no evidence of an immediate emergency arising. I do not say there is no evidence of an emergency arising in the next two or three months. I think myself it is probable that such an emergency will arise. But that is not the question we are involved in. We are not asked to decide on a probable emergency in the future. The question before the Senate of the United States is whether we shall grant the discretion to the President of the United States in reference to certain lines of wire stretching across this country that we granted to him to take the boys of the land from their homes, to take fuel from the firesides, to take food from the mouths of the people if necessary to win the war. Then do you say that the Senate of the United States will hesitate at the door of giving the President of the United States control over the line that may stop a spy system control over the lines of communication in which we can move our troops, lines on which the very life of the Army may exist, that that does not invade the home of the individual and the life of the Nation but it is merely a question of dollars involved with certain great corporations in this land? So far as I can see there is no occasion to investigate, there is no occasion to hesitate.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has been citing parallels to prove his case. One is the Fuel Administration. Is it not a fact that there was a great emergency on the fuel proposition? Is it not a fact that the great question was whether or not we should be able to feed our allies and ourselves?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. At the time we passed the food-control act the emergency that confronted the country was purely theoretical. It did exist subsequently. The theory was correct. It was necessary for us to conserve our food to supply our allies, but it did not exist at the time of the passage of the measure, neither did we order that it should be done. We left it to the discretion of the Executive.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator mean to state that jurisdiction was given to anybody to control the food of this country by any bill ever passed by Congress? If so, I should like to be cited to the act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The food-supply bill, of course, has been worked out largely through the instrumentality of public sentiment and the response of the good women of this land to the wishes of the Government of the United States, but we did pass a bill authorizing the Food Commissioner to use certain money for the purchase of wheat. We granted him certain powers in reference to the control of the wheat market, and it was wheat that we had under consideration when we passed that bill. In addition to that we granted him a power that absolutely allows him to control the situation. We gave him the unlimited power to license the business of this country and to deny the right to do business by denying the right of a license. Of course, when that power was granted by the Senate and the House of Representatives it granted the power to control the food situation of the United States.

Mr. REED. I am sorry to hear the Senator make that statement, because the history of the legislation to which he is now referring, the debates, all that went along with the legislation, including Mr. Hoover's own testimony, show that there never was any pretense of doing anything more than stopping profiteering, keeping the lines of trade open so that there would not be any corners in the market, and a steadying of the market by the purchase and sale through the Wheat Export Co. or a company that might be organized. The power of license was understood at that time to go no further than to compel the licensee to conform to reasonable rules and regulations, but it has been distorted into a power to control the supplies of the people. I can show the Senator Mr. Hoover's own testimony, in which he repudiates any such purpose or intent.

I am sorry the Senator with the weight of his great influence apparently sanctions the employment of that licensing power so that it amounts to a power to control absolutely the supply of food to the people of this country. That bill would not have received 10 votes in this body if it had been stated in terms that it proposed to give to any man the right to control the food supply of our people.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not taking issue with the Senator from Missouri. I heard the testimony of Mr. Hoover. I realize the situation. More than that, I realize that there is no man in the Congress of the United States better informed on that particular enactment of Congress than the Senator from Missouri, and I yield to his wisdom in the matter. But, nevertheless, the concrete statements of fact that I made can not be denied that the Congress of the United States granted to the Federal administration the power to license all business in this country and that that power carried with it the absolute control of the food situation and does to-day.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator from Alabama is endeavoring to prove his case by a parallel for the purpose of convincing those who listen to him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not trying to prove it. I am just stating the case. The case proves itself.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that at the time we passed the food bill the Government had full estimates of the coming crop? It knew precisely the situation. It knew what the demand was, and is it not a fact that at the time we passed the food bill flour was selling in this country at $18 a barrel, and because of the exigent necessity of that hour we passed the bill to meet the emergency which then confronted us, and it was not some nebulous or mystic smoke dancing about in the moonbeams that we were trying to pull down.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the situation—of course that is a mere matter of opinion——

Mr. WATSON. No; it is a matter of fact.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I beg my friend's pardon. I think it is a matter of opinion. I do not think the situation that confronts us to-day is any more nebulous than the situation which confronted us when we passed these other enactments. We did not then know the situation; we were not apprised as to the facts; we did not attempt to pass judgment on the question. The only thing that confronted us was that we believed that we had an emergency and an exigency to meet in the future, and we met it by giving to the President of the United States the discretion to exercise the authority to meet it.

Mr. HARDING and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the Senator from Ohio rose first, and I yield to him.

Mr. HARDING. I want to ask the Senator from Alabama if he will not admit, however, that the public-service utilities which he is proposing to give authority to take over are already essentially under license and control on the part of the various public-utilities commissions throughout the States?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I think they are throughout the States; and that very fact might hamper the hands of the Federal Government.

Mr. HARDING. Now, if the Senator will tell the Senate how it will hamper the Government, we shall be obliged to him.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not know how it would; I can not answer that question definitely; I say that it might; I do not say that it would; but the fact that those companies are regulated can not affect the situation. I desire to say, however, that, so far as I know, there is no situation that stands over the fence facing us which, if I were asked to vote to myself the exercise of the discretion to take over these corporations to-morrow, would lead me to do so, though it might arise in 30 days; and if it might arise in 30 days, I am willing, for war purposes, to give the President of the United States power to take them over. Why should we not? We have taken over the boys of the land, the food of the land, the fuel of the land, and there is nothing involved here but a line of wires and a question of dollars; there is no human interest involved in this joint resolution; we have invaded the very homes of our land with the exercise of the discretion of the President, but the human side of the Nation is not touched in this joint resolution. The only thing that is involved is a line of dead, cold steel and copper and dollars in the Treasury of the United States. If this property is taken from its present owners, the joint resolution authorizes the payment of just compensation, and so just are its terms that even the men involved do not question them.

Mr. HARDING. Does the Senator think for a moment that the only question involved is one of compensation to the companies concerned?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the only question, so far as they are concerned. Of course behind that question, behind the real question, so far as the people are concerned as to whether it affects them, the price of food might affect every home in this land; the price of railroad transportation might affect every industry in the land; but the price of a telegram is going to affect no one seriously; not a human being in this land is going to be seriously affected by whether the price of a telegram goes up 5 cents or comes down 5 cents.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from Alabama avoids the use of the word "telephone."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, if the Senator desires my opinion about it, I will say that I can not speak with authority; but I do not think there is any probability whatever of the taking over of the telephones in this land, except it might be to meet a local situation in some seaport for the moment or the hour; but so far as taking over the telephones of the country is concerned, permanently or in any large class or as a system, I do not think there is any possibility of it; and yet there might be an occasion arise during this war when the telephone system at New York or at Newport News might be of the utmost value to the Government to control for the purposes of the war; and I do not know of any way in which you can write a measure and differentiate between the telephone lines in one town and those in another.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator think that power exists now?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, it possibly does; but what is the harm of giving it again if it does exist? I do not see any harm in regranting it.

Mr. REED. Now, if the Senator will permit—I say this by way of preliminary—we ought to present this question just as it is. It is true that technically the joint resolution proposes to vest in the President of the United States the discretion to take over in whole or in part these lines, and the language is:

Whenever he shall deem it necessary for the national security or defense.

So the Senator is technically accurate when he states that all Congress is doing by this joint resolution is to authorize the President, when he considers an emergency has arisen, to then, upon the happening of that emergency, to take over the systems. That is technically correct; but for all practical purposes are we not confronted with the situation that it is undoubtedly proposed to take possession at once of these lines?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Not so far as my information goes. Of course the Senator may have more information than I have.

Mr. REED. Well, let me give the Senator this information: It has already been laid before the Senate by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], but it is so pertinent to the Senator's remarks that I think we ought to consider it here. Here is a letter from Mr. Burleson to Mr. SIMS, the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the other House:

MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Answering your inquiry requesting my "opinion as to the desirability and advisability of the immediate passage" of the Aswell joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) giving the President power, "if in his discretion it is deemed desirable," to assume control of the communicating systems by electricity "in order to insure their continuous operation" during the occasion of war and "to guard the secrecy of military and governmental communications or to prevent communication by spies and other public enemies," I beg to say that such power and discretion to act seems imperative to safeguard public interests.

That is all in the future; but notice this:

At this moment the paralysis of a large part of the system of electrical communication is threatened, with possible consequences prejudicial to our military preparations and other public activities that might prove serious or disastrous.

And notice this language:

We are reminded that there is not a nation engaged in the war that intrusts its military or other communications to unofficial agencies.

I deem it, therefore, my duty not merely to approve but to urge the passage of the resolution, in order that the President may act, if necessary, to safeguard the interests of the country during the prosecution of the war.

Respectfully,

A. S. BURLESON,
Postmaster General.

Take those two statements; one is that the emergency now exists in the threatened strike; the other is the bald statement that there is not a single nation engaged in war that trusts its lines of communication to private ownership. Now, notice what the President says of and concerning that letter:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, 28 June, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. SIMS: Thank you for consulting me about the inclosed. I indorse entirely the inclosed letter from the Postmaster General, which I herewith return, and think that the reasons are stated by him truly and comprehensively.

The reasons were, first, a strike; and, second, that no modern nation engaged in the war allowed its lines of telegraph to be in private ownership. It does seem to me—and I state this to the Senator because I know of no fairer man; I do not always agree with his arguments, but I agree with his purposes—it does seem to me that it is perfectly plain that the intention is to take possession, either totally or partially, of these lines, and to do it upon the existing conditions; and that we ought to pass this joint resolution with that understanding and not fool ourselves at all about it.

I am not saying that the joint resolution in some form ought not to pass, but I do not think the Senator really thinks, or that anybody else really thinks, that it is not the purpose to act.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have not said that I did not think it was the purpose to act eventually. I merely said that no testimony had come before me or no facts had come to my knowledge to show that action immediately was necessary.

I am not, however, proposing to decide this case. I know that I have not the information with reference to this matter that the Executive of this Nation has; I know that I can not possibly have the facts to act on that lie within the breast of the Executive of this Government.

I further know that possibly—it may be possible, but indeed it is probable—there are conditions existing that it might not be wise to have them given general publicity, and therefore I am not deciding the case on the present moment. If I were deciding the case on the present moment I would ask the Senate to let us take the joint resolution back into the committee and investigate the facts. That is not disturbing me at all, because I am not proposing to decide it myself. My decision is only asked on one question—am I willing to give the discretion to the President to decide the question in this war emergency? I am, and therefore, why should I go further? That ends the question; there is no further place to go. It is either the question of whether I will give it or whether I will withhold it.

So far as the strike is concerned, I am satisfied that there is no impending strike in this country that is likely to jeopardize the lines of communication.

So far as relates to the facts stated in the letter that all the allied countries, in fact, all the countries involved in this war, unless it be some of the minor countries that we do not know of, except ours, control their telegraph lines of communication; that is true.

Mr. REED. And the Postmaster General might have said that the foreign countries always have controlled them; they did not take them over after the war, but they had been under practically complete control.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is a correct statement of the fact.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. I want to ask the Senator from Alabama if he has the impression from statements of Cabinet officers that it is the intention to take over these lines of communication—which is evidently manifest—but that he himself sees no emergency existing at the moment? Does the Senator believe that the Senate ought to provide for so radical a change in the affairs of this Nation without a fuller investigation and a fuller knowledge of the subject?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend that, in the first place, I am not in the confidence of the Cabinet officers; they are not in the habit of giving me their inner consciousness; and so, therefore, from that standpoint I shall have to refer the Senator to somebody else.

Mr. HARDING. Well, would it embarrass the Senator from Alabama to say what his impression is concerning their intent?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no knowledge of it. The only knowledge I have of any intent with reference to this matter is a communication of the President of the United States to the Members of the House and the Members of the Senate, saying that he regards this legislation as a war necessity.

Mr. HARDING. Then let me ask the Senator——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the point on which I decided the question right there; I go no further.

Mr. HARDING. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think, in case there is a real war emergency, such as Congress must make provision for by this extraordinary change, that it would be a seemly thing for the Chief Executive to communicate officially with Congress—something for which he has rare facility?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubt, if the emergency existed to-day on which the President desired or intended to act, that to-day he would lay the facts before the country; but he has not asked us to adopt this legislation because of a condition that exists to-day; he asks us to adopt the legislation to arm him for the future. It is like the case of the man who went West with a gun. It was not his desire to use the gun, but he knew, if he went into the wilds of the West in the early days of that section, that without a gun he might get into serious trouble before he got back. That is all there is in this legislation. It is not a question of the use of the gun to-day; it is a question as to whether we are going to arm the President of the United States with this legislation with which to fight in the future. That is all there is of it. If the Senator thinks that we ought not to arm him, if it is his judgment that we can not trust the President with this legislation and this discretion, he ought to vote against the joint resolution; but I feel, after voting for all the legislation I have voted for, trusting the President to invade the homes of the land and take the boys, to interfere with the food supply, and to control the fuel of the United States, that I can safely trust him with the control of these wires. That is the whole question, as I see it.

Mr. HARDING. May I ask the Senator one more question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. HARDING. Would not the same logic and the same arming for defense have suggested in the mind of a thoughtful Executive some war preparation in 1915?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is a question as to whether or not we acted wisely in 1915. I suppose, if you will go back to 1913, you can convict every government in the world of not acting wisely. Even Germany did not act wisely, because in 1913, when it was preparing for the war of 1914, it misconceived the war it was going to get into and the necessity that would confront it before it got out. Therefore, if we are to go back into the past, I presume an indictment could be brought against every nation in the world for lack of judgment, and it could be found guilty.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, speaking for myself, I am only anxious, in order that I may arrive at a conclusion as to what I shall do in this matter, to know what the military exigency is that exists at the present time, or wherein the Government can not control sufficiently the situation by reason of its present power over the system of wire communication. As I understand, at this time everything that goes by cable is censored before it goes out and before it comes in. If I can be informed either as to the present exigency or as to wherein the Government has not the hold which it is necessary for it to have in order to control this situation, I shall arrive very hastily at the conclusion that I ought to vote for this joint resolution; but, unless I have those facts, unless I am given to know wherein the defect lies, or wherein the lack of power rests, of course, I am going to vote against it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not wise enough to answer the Senator fully; but perhaps I can illustrate the point in some way. In some of the States of the Union it is against the law for an employee of the Western Union or other telegraph company to disclose the secrets of messages transmitted. I think it is not a penitentiary offense, but is punished by fine and imprisonment. In other States there is no such protection. I think it has been stated that there are 75,000 employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. through whose hands secret messages of the Government must pass. It is true, of course, that important ones go in cipher; but, as the Senator is well aware, there is no cipher that has ever been devised that has not been worked out where a sufficient number of the code messages could be obtained. So there is no protection in that regard. I do not say that if we take over the wires we can avoid that entirely; but it is possible if certain lines of communication were entirely in the hands of the President of the United States, and possibly under military control, that we might be better able to handle the situation.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Alabama how he expects any different condition under Government control than he does under the control we now have?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because the law would be very much more far-reaching and more forceful when the Government has control of the properties.

Mr. HARDING. There is nothing in the joint resolution to cover that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No; not in the joint resolution; but the general laws of the land would apply; and, if we take the business over, it will be within our power to pass additional laws.

Mr. HARDING. Well, would it not be a simple matter to pass a statute to regulate the conduct of the employees handling Government messages?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not say that it could not be done in that way. The Senator asked me a question, and I am giving him some illustrations in reference to the matter which apply to the present situation. I am not prepared to say that the joint resolution is the only way to settle this question or all questions in relation to the subject; but I have heard rumblings nearer home. There may be necessity for immediate action before long. I do not state that as a fact, because I am not informed. I may be misled; but it does affect my judgment to some extent about the matter. In other words, when I come to decide this matter it is not a question of testimony; there is not any man who can be brought before the Senate or before its committees who can enlighten us as to what is going to happen in the future. We have reported this joint resolution back, candidly telling the Senate that we have no facts to present as to the necessity for the action to-morrow or the next day; but we realize that the necessity may arise within 30 days; and, if it does arise, there should not be a question of waiting indefinitely for action by Congress, but there should be opportunity to consider it within the hour and to act on it within the hour, and that is what we are providing for.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I presume that there is no more efficient organization in the world than the Western Union Telegraph Co., at least——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will not say that there is no more efficient organization in the world than the Western Union Telegraph Co., but I will say that, among the telegraph companies of the world, I do not think there is any more efficient company.

Mr. BORAH. I doubt if, for the purposes for which it is organized and the duties which it is discharging, there is any more efficient corporate organization in the world than the Western Union Telegraph Co. The other company may be equally efficient, but I am not so familiar with its operation. Now, efficiency will not be increased by governmental control. We will assume, for the sake of the argument—and it is a violent assumption—that the service will be kept up to its present efficiency. It certainly will not exceed its present efficiency. Having the efficiency now, and if we are to assume that the employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. are loyal, if there is not somewhere a break in the loyalty of the employees, have we not a situation which should be satisfactory to the Government? It seems to me that the inference must be drawn that the Government can get a better hold and control more perfectly the actions, the disposition, and loyalty of the employees by reason of having control; otherwise I can not possibly see how the Government can be helped by public control.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the Senator that, so far as I know, taking the employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. as a whole, there has been no indication of disloyalty. The statement of the president of that company before the committee having this joint resolution in charge was that he would stand for the loyalty of 95 per cent of his employees.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt he is correct.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And I have no doubt he is correct, but he recognized, as the Senator recognizes and as I recognize, that in 75,000 men there is likely to be some man who is disloyal; there is likely to be some man who can be purchased. So we can not try this case on the question of loyalty. One man may turn the whole thing wrong.

Mr. BORAH. If we can not try it upon the question of loyalty or upon the question of efficiency when the emergency arises, then I am at an utter loss to know how we can strengthen our position by governmental control. I heard yesterday that there are 300,000 agents of the Department of Justice who might be called secret-service agents, now in the employ, direct or indirect, of the Government. If there are 300,000 men in the employ of the Government as secret-service agents, I will venture to say that there are just as many disloyal men among that number as there are amongst the Western Union men.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Probably the Senator is right, but I do not think he understood the statement. There is a very much less number of men in the service to which he refers. Probably the number of men actually employed as secret-service agents who have taken the oath of allegiance to the Government of the United States and are on its pay roll is limited to a few thousand, much less than 100,000.

But the Department of Justice has organized societies and clubs, volunteer aids, throughout the United States in every State in the country. A man goes up and takes oath that he will support the Constitution and disclose any secrets or anything he hears that may work to the injury of the country. They are simply volunteer aids. What they bring in they disclose to the secret-service agents of the Department of Justice. A large proportion of what is brought in is discarded at once; and out of the chaff the real wheat is gathered and investigated. Now, that is all there is in that; there are not 300,000 men so employed; there are only a few thousand men.

Mr. BORAH. Well, Mr. President, perhaps the number is too large, but——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If you include all those who have taken the oath and belong to the societies to which I have referred, there probably are 200,000 or 300,000 men; that is correct; but they are not really Government agents.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I supposed. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator unduly, but I do want to say that it seems to me that we ought to have submitted to us in some form a statement of how the Government will be strengthened by taking over these corporations and how the service will be made, from a military standpoint, more effective and more efficient. If that can be shown, so far as I am concerned, I am through with the debate and ready to vote; but if we are here passing upon this proposition as a first step to permanent Government ownership, the second step to come a little later, then there are a good many questions I should like to consider before I vote on it. In other words, we should know more about the reason for this program.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I do not regard the vote on this joint resolution as passing on Government ownership. I think that a comparatively small amount of this property will be taken over if the joint resolution is passed, although all of it may be taken over under the terms of the joint resolution.

As to the question of whether or not it will improve the conditions of the Army and Navy of the United States and assist the Government in guarding its secrets, making more efficient its forces, and more effectively controlling the military arm of the country is solely an opinion. It can not be anything else but an opinion at this time. The Senator is entitled to his opinion; I am entitled to my opinion; the President of the United States is entitled to his opinion, and he has expressed it. He has expressed the opinion that it is necessary; and knowing that he has facts that I am not possessed of, knowing that he has an intimate knowledge of the war conditions that govern our Army and our Secret Service that I am not possessed of, and knowing that the only thing involved in this proposition is dollars and not human life and human energy and human safety, after swallowing all the others I am not going to hesitate now and deny the President's opinion. That is all that is in the joint resolution.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to ask the Senator if the President has ever indicated to any member of the committee that he has certain knowledge of such an important nature that he could not in confidence tell it to any member of the committee which would justify the passage of this joint resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not answer the Senator's question. The President has not communicated with me; and, in fact, so far as I am concerned, the President has had no communication with me in reference to this measure. He has communicated with other Senators. How far he has gone in those communications I can not state.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I recall very well that when there was a proposition here in the Senate some time last year authorizing the President to lay an embargo on ports and commodities the Senate declined to intrust the President with that power, because there was no explanation of why it was necessary. After, however, the President had told the Senate, or some leaders of the Senate, in confidence why it was necessary, and as soon as that information was given to the Senate in confidence, the Senate gladly altered its position and passed the bill.

Now, the Senator states that he has heard nothing from the President. The Senator is a member of the committee, and it seems to me he should have heard something, or some member of the committee should. May I ask whether the Senator has learned whether or not any other member of the committee has learned from the President any secret and confidential information that would indicate the necessity of the passage of this joint resolution?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. As I say, I have not. I am not the chairman of the committee; I am not a leader of the Senate, and there was no reason why the President should communicate with me. I am merely a high private in the rear ranks, and away down at the bottom of the list on this committee; so there was no reason on earth why I should be communicated with. I have not been, and therefore I have no knowledge of any facts from the President. I know that the President has communicated with the leader of the majority party in this body, and has said that this legislation was not only necessary but was so urgently necessary that he did not want the Congress to take a recess until it was passed. I know that he has communicated with other Members of this body who are members of the Interstate Commerce Committee, in which communication he has urged the immediate passage of this legislation as a war necessity. How much further he went with those Senators, or how much further information he gave them, I do not know.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, is not the Senator a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am; but, as I say, I am down at the foot of the list. I am a new member of the committee.

The position I take in this matter, and have taken from the beginning, is that I am not willing to withhold this power from the President when he says a war necessity stands behind it, and I know that it does not invade the homes or the liberties or the rights of the American people, and the only cost that can come to the Nation is possibly the cost of a few dollars; and we are not counting dollars in fighting this war.

Mr. VARDAMAN and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield the floor.

Mr. WATSON. I wanted to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi is recognized.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am so thoroughly in accord with the views expressed by the able Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], who has just preceded me, that to express in words my views would be but a repetition of what he has said.

We all understand as well as we know that we are living that this request of the President of the United States for authority to take over the telephone and telegraph lines as a war measure is going to be granted. Then why waste the time in further discussion? Imperial powers have been conferred upon the President; powers that belong to the legislative and administrative departments of the Government have been conferred upon him. In a word, we have vested in him what seems to me plenary powers to conduct the war. There is no ruler beneath the stars to-day with more authority than the President of these United States. In some things that we have done I thought that probably we went further than was prudent to go, but the Congress has done it. The responsibility of conducting the war is with the President, and it is too late for us to question or to withhold for a moment the request he is making with reference to the telegraph and telephone lines in this country. As the responsibility has been put upon him we can not afford to withhold any authority he thinks necessary to accomplish the enormous undertaking. I am going to vote for this resolution. I am going to confer upon the President any other power that he thinks necessary to win this war. I should prefer that the Congress reserve the right to fix the compensation that is to be given the telephone and telegraph companies for Government use, but the committee, following a number of precedents, have reported the resolution as it is, and I have concluded to take it as it has been reported by the committee.

I did not rise, however, for the purpose of discussing that question, but I deem it proper that I should say this much. I know the joint resolution is going to be agreed to; and it is going to be passed in a very few days, and it ought to be passed at once.

I am going to ask the Senate to indulge me for a few moments while I discuss what is known as the prohibition amendment to the Agricultural bill, which is the unfinished business before the Senate. To that question, Mr. President, I shall address myself briefly.

Mr. President, this amendment ought to be agreed to. Time and trial have demonstrated the pernicious effect of alcoholic stimulants upon the human body. They have also shown that it is more to be dreaded by the purse of the poor man than the daring sneak thief who invades the sacred precincts of the peaceful home in the dark hour of midnight. It has been shown beyond the peradventure of a doubt that alcohol is destructive to the vital forces that make men strong. It undermines the nervous system, which is the source of the power of endurance. It stifles the aspirations of the soul, which is the mainspring of every successful life. It chloroforms "that noble discontent which stirs the acorn to become the oak," and lowers generally the standard of the physical, the moral, and the intellectual man. I have observed its ravages. I have seen the stalwart young athlete, with body erect, eyes flashing with the fire of enthusiasm, perfect features, marble brow, change to the wrinkled-faced, flabby, whisky-soaked creature, with the complexion of a pickled pomegranate and eyes that look like frost-bitten plums and a nose that resembles a frozen tomato; the body distorted and the divine qualities drowned in the sewer of drink—a sad spectacle, indeed. The effect of alcohol unsteadies the hand, saps the physical virility, and therefore is detrimental to the soldier. It has proven to be materially hurtful to the laboring man; it lessens his efficiency, and all will admit its brutalizing effect, when taken to excess, upon the husband, the father, the brother, and the son in the home.

Mr. President, alcoholic liquor is an evil without a mitigating incident, and the necessity for the continuation of the traffic can not be conscientiously defended by any person who is intellectually honest and sober. With all of these admitted facts I am at a loss to understand how the Congress can hesitate to enact laws which will wipe out and forever prohibit the nefarious business.

The food that goes into the manufacture of beer is needed to feed our women and children at home, our soldiers in the trenches of France, and our allies "over there." To force our people at home to eat this "cow feed" which we find upon the tables of the restaurants, the hotels, and in the private homes, while the brewers are using 4,000,000 bushels of clean grain every month, is inexcusable and an intolerable mistake. It is more; it is a sin in the sight of God and a crime against humanity.

If it were not for the pecuniary profits derived from this industry—some of which, I dare say, are being devoted to subsidizing newspapers for the purpose of cultivating public sentiment—little opposition would be made to this amendment.

The American people demand the enactment of the legislation embodied in this amendment. They demand it because the exigencies of war make it necessary. They demand it not only as a war measure but as a most salutary peace measure. They know that it is necessary for the moral, material, and educational welfare of our people at home—the laboring men in the shops, the farmers in the fields, and our soldiers in the trenches. In a word, it is necessary for the betterment of mankind in all the walks of life. Even the idle rich, lounging in their luxurious parlors, will be benefited by it.

America has need for physical strength, nerve power, which is vital to the issue that confronts us at this moment. We must have a sober America. A clear vision, a steady hand, and a stout heart are essential to the success of our arms. There is not a man on the Western Hemisphere who does not believe that America would be better off without these alcoholic stimulants, except probably some individual whose mind is either beclouded by the fumes of drink, influenced by political considerations, or suffering with a case of money-colored judgment. There is no argumcnt in favor of the liquor traffic. There is no justification for using 4,000,000 bushels of foodstuffs per month in the manufacture of beer and consuming coal that ought to be conserved to warm the freezing millions of this country next winter. There is no reason why whisky should be sold to add misery to our already suffering and sorely distressed people. Just because it is profitable to the owners of whisky or the brewers is not an excuse or justification. When I hear the argument advanced that it is improper or impolitic or unfair to stop the manufacture of beer or the sale of whisky because somebody's purse may suffer it fills my heart with mingled feelings of pity and contempt—pity for the person advancing the silly argument, and ineffable contempt for the argument.

The man who put the dollar above the welfare of the innocent child, the peace and happiness of the loving mother who blesses the toiler's home, the man who holds the profits of the liquor business as of more importance to the world than all of those things that I have mentioned has a very peculiar standard of value. It is a standard that the good men and women of the world will not accept; a standard that bears the stamp of disapproval of the great God of the universe.

Mr. President, the most valuable thing beneath the stars is the human being. The humblest man, woman, or child in the United States to-day, I care not how low he may have fallen, is of more importance in the sight of God than the constellations that swing in the heavens, the swelling seas, the rushing rivers, and the boundless plains; and the most acceptable service to God is service to man. The Man of Galilee emphasized that fact when He thus mildly reproved His disciples who sought to prevent Him from being annoyed by the attention of inconsequential people:

> Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God.

Congress is legislating for the good of all the people of America and not to protect the pecuniary interests of the brewers and the liquor dealers. I do not desire to interfere with anybody's legitimate business. I am in favor of prudent, well-digested legislation, that will do the most good to all and the least harm to any; but this legislation ought to be enacted.

Mr. President, the verdict of the laboratory of industry and the judgment of the world is against alcohol, because it is a breeder of inefficiency. It has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. Every drop of the damnable stuff contains an eternity of woe. Every moment of joy which it brings to the drunken brain is paid for by 24 hours of suffering. It has blighted more lives, frustrated more ambitions, caused more heartaches, disappointment, and failure in the world than all other agencies for evil combined. Thank God, the hard-hearted, firm-fisted captains of industry have at last joined with the mothers of America to drive this enemy out of our midst. These great masters of industry care little for the moral or social phases of the drink question. For years they turned a deaf ear to the pleadings of suffering women and children. They were willing that men should drink, until they discovered that drink rendered men less efficient. When they discovered that the man who drank was less efficient than the man who did not drink, they at once became prohibitionists. This discovery has led these great captains of industry to unite with the altruist, the philanthropist, and the humanitarian to rid the world of this incomparable curse. Alcohol might have trampled on the garments of morality and social relations until doomsday, and it would not have worried industry as such; but when alcohol begins to tease and harass the great god of industry's pet mascot, efficiency, it is quite another matter. Thank God, the truth has been brought to the surface. The world sees the liquor business in all its naked atrocity.

Now is the time to strike the evil. Strike it down as a war emergency, and from this war emergency I confidently believe a great social, moral, and economic reform will be effected.

I shall vote for this amendment, and with all my heart I hope that it may be agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HENDERSON in the chair). The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Smoot
Bankhead	Kellogg	Poindexter	Sterling
Beckham	Kenyon	Pomerene	Sutherland
Benet	King	Ransdell	Swanson
Calder	Knox	Saulsbury	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lenroot	Shafroth	Thompson
Colt	Lewis	Sheppard	Trammell
Curtis	McCumber	Sherman	Underwood
Fernald	McKellar	Shields	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Martin	Simmons	Warren
France	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	Watson
Gerry	New	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott
Henderson	Norris	Smith, Md.
Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Smith, Mich.
Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Smith, S. C.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Fifty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am not going to ask any Senator to vote for this joint resolution to grant these powers, nor am I going to ask any Senator not to do so; but as a member of the committee I deem it my duty, as well as my privilege, to state as nearly as I can the facts surrounding the telegraph, cable, and telephone business of this country, and to point out, as far as I am able to do so, the tremendous obligations which this country must assume if it takes over the operation of all of these properties.

As I have said before, I shall deem it my duty to give to the President every power which seems to be necessary, or which I believe may become necessary, to make more effective the prosecution of this war. I think, however, it is due the Senate to know as much as possible about the steps it is to take if this measure is to pass. It is a question of surpassing importance. It is not merely a question of dollars to a few corporations. No man in the Senate is going to hesitate a moment about granting a power that merely affects the dollars of individuals or of corporations. We have set our faces to the East; we are bound to win this war; and to do so we are going to invoke every agency and every power that the genius, the ability, and the wealth of this country can command. But this step, especially the operation of the telephones, touches the intimate social and personal as well as business relations of every citizen in this country, and we should at least know whether this step is necessary, whether it will add strength to the Government, and whether there is likely to arise any emergency in which the taking over of the telegraph and the telephone lines may aid the Government in the prosecution of the war.

It was the duty, I believe, of the committee to which the joint resolution was referred to have made as rapidly as possible some investigation, some inquiry, so that we might have been able to inform the Senate of the conditions of the telegraph and telephone business in this country.

On Saturday at 5 o'clock in the afternoon the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] asked the committee to meet in the room of the Committee on Appropriations, and at that time the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and Mr. KITCHIN, the majority leader of the House of Representatives, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, met with the committee. The committee was urged by those gentlemen to say whether they would be willing to sit in vacation immediately to make a thorough investigation and as speedily as possible to report this bill to the Senate. Every member of the committee present expressed his willingness to do so, and the following resolution was adopted:

It is moved that it is the sense of the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate that it proceed without delay to enter upon a hearing upon House resolution 309, and that the chairman of the committee be requested to make the necessary arrangement for the attendance of interested parties, and that a report upon the resolution be made as soon as possible.

At that time every member of the committee and the Democratic leaders, in fact everyone present, urged that the investigation be made and that a report of the facts be made to the Senate. That statement went out over the country to the thousands of people who are interested in the telephone and telegraph lines, and I have no doubt they assumed that they would be given an opportunity briefly to state their position before the committee.

On Monday the committee met and without any discussion of the joint resolution voted to report it. The Senate refused to receive the report because only four members of the committee voted for it.

On Tuesday morning the committee met again. As President Carlton, of the Western Union Co., happened to be in town, and I understand expressed a wish to make a brief statement before the committee, he was permitted to do so. He did not place himself or his company in opposition to the taking over the telegraph lines if it was thought best as a war emergency, although he frankly admitted he knew of no reason why it should be done. I do not think the committee desires the opinion of any man as to whether it shall be done or shall not be done, but they ought to have the opinion of men who know the conditions of the telegraph and telephones and cables, the latter reaching many foreign countries, before making a recommendation.

Mr. Carlton gave his testimony before the committee. Unfortunately it has not been reported accurately and has not been revised by him so that it can be in the hands of Senators. The committee did not even have before it the printed testimony of three of the Cabinet officials who testified before the House committee. It had not been printed at that time, or if it had been printed it was not available to the committee.

The committee refused and voted down a resolution to invite Secretaries Daniels and Baker and Postmaster General Burleson and the Chief of the Signal Corps to appear before the committee and explain the reasons for taking over the telegraph, telephone, and cable companies. It voted down a motion to invite the independent telephone companies, numbering over 8,000, whose representatives were outside the door and ready to be heard. It voted down a resolution to invite the Postal and the American Telegraph and Telephone Companies and the employees of those companies to be heard, and, without any consideration at all, reported this measure, recommending that it pass.

Mr. President, I am not criticizing the members of the committee. I realize that on the question whether a power shall be granted to the President to take over telegraph and telephone lines, every Senator in this Chamber is able to consider and make up his mind for himself, provided he knows all the facts which a committee should have gathered and should have submitted to the Senate. There could not have been that compelling emergency for immediate action. The committee could have considered the whole subject in two or three days. We have been going on in this war for a year and three months and not until a question arose between a pretended labor union and the Western Union Co. had any suggestion been made of any emergency or any reason why these numerous companies and these wires should be taken over by the Government. I do not say there may not be a reason, and if I had any reasonable ground to believe that there is a valid reason, of course I should vote to do it. I should like to know from somebody what the emergency is, or the possible emergency, that is all.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that Congress ought to know these reasons. It ought to know the extent and ramifications of the various telephone and telegraph companies, and it ought particularly to know the ramifications of the cable lines reaching from this country to foreign countries, the conditions under which they are held; and it ought to know the obligations which the country is going to assume if it takes over the operation of these telephones which reach nearly every family in the United States, for there are more than 60,000,000 messages a day sent in this country, and they reach the intimate family associations of almost every man in the land.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Does the Senator mean 60,000,000 telegraphic messages?

Mr. KELLOGG. Sixty million telephone messages.

Mr. President, as briefly as possible, let me describe the property which will have to be taken over, and I see no escape from the proposition that if the telephone is taken over it must be taken over as a whole—all the independent as well as the so-called Bell or American telegraph and telephone systems. The leading companies in the telegraph lines are the Western Union and the Postal. Connected with each of these companies are various subsidiary companies, in which the parent companies are interested or which they control by various leases and other arrangements.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have just listened to the statement of the Senator as to the magnitude of the business of these companies. He is now proceeding to make a statement evidently regarding the value of the properties. I should like to get the Senator's view as to the relevancy of either of those inquiries. In other words, if it becomes a war necessity to control these lines, what difference does the magnitude of the business or the amount of the property involved make.

Mr. KELLOGG. It makes no difference whatever. I will say to the Senator, if it is necessary to take them over to win the war or to aid in the winning of the war, we will do so, and we will take over every industry in this land. We will vote every dollar that every man has got and we will give every last dollar of the national wealth to win the war. But it did seem to me that, in view of the circumstances, the Senate ought to know just what it is doing. If the Senate does not wish it, of course, I shall not take the time to go ahead.

Mr. STERLING. I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota if the compensation to be paid for the control, supervision, and operation of the lines does not have something to do with or is not based to some extent on the value of the property taken, and is not that an important element?

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, that is true, and that is one of the questions which it took us many weeks to consider in the railroad case. But no one is going to stop on account of expense to the Government or thereby be deterred from voting to authorize the President to take over these lines.

I was saying that those are the principal telegraph lines. There are a few independent companies. I shall not stop to take the time of the Senate to state the extent and the value of the telegraph and telephone companies. I ask to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a summary of the report of the telephone companies and a brief statement of the capitalization of property investments of the telegraph companies. The telegraph companies reporting to the Interstate Commerce Commission show a total investment of $154,149,113, although it appears from the testimony of Mr. Carlton that the assets of the Western Union alone are about $200,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not sure that I understood the Senator. Did he state that $154,000,000 was the value of the telegraph or telephone companies?

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, no; the telegraph companies. The statement of classes A, B, and C of the telephone companies show property investments as reported to the Interstate Commerce Commission of $1,991,549,075. I will say here that, while some people have suggested a reason for taking over the telegraph and cable lines, I have yet heard no suggestion of any reason for taking over the thousands of telephone companies in this country or any of them.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator state what the classes are?

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator from Indiana asks me to state what are the classes. Class A is all companies having a gross income of over $250,000; class B, between $50,000 and $250,000; and class C, from $10,000 to $50,000 per annum. I ask that this statement be placed at the end of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the request of the Senator from Minnesota will be granted.

Mr. KELLOGG. I might say in passing that there are over 8,000 independent telephone companies in this country, not counting the thousands of farmers' lines that are connected up with the various other companies. The cable lines are still more important. There are reasons, to my mind, that make it impossible for the United States Government to own or to operate cable lines unless it has an agreement with the Governments of all the countries to which those cable lines run. The Western Union Co. owns or, rather, leases two cable lines to England owned by the American Telegraph & Cable Co. I am speaking from memory, and I may not get these names accurately. It also has a lease of all of the lines of the Anglo-American Telegraph & Cable Co., a corporation of Great Britain, four in number, I believe, extending from this country to England. It also owns or has a lease of the Direct Cable Co.'s line, an English corporation, extending from this country also to England.

The Postal Telegraph Co. has, I believe, four or five lines reaching between the same points. This company is the Commercial Cable Co., and is owned in some way by the Postal line, I do not know exactly how.

The Central & South American Telegraph Co. owns various lines extending from Philadelphia to Cuba, from Cuba to Colon and Panama, from Galveston to points in Mexico and along the western coast of South America, across the South American Continent between Valparaiso and Buenos Aires, and up the eastern coast, as well as lines and connections into the interior of South America. The Western Union, I believe, holds the principal lines, which it acquired from the English company under a 99 years' lease. I do not know the length of the lease of the Direct Cable Co. or of the American company which is connected with the Western Union Co.

Mr. President, there are generally what are known as two systems of telephones in this country, the Bell system, which is known as the American Telephone & Telegraph Co., and the independent lines, numbering, as I said, over 8,000. It is absolutely impossible to separate those lines between the great trunk lines so-called and the subsidiary lines reaching to various towns and communities and even to farmers in this country. The great lines of long-distance or what we may call the trunk lines are not separate from the lines which serve every man in the Senate and the people of this country in their homes and their shops and their offices. The line between here and New York is not operated by trunk-line operatives. There are no trunk-line operatives in the city of Baltimore. The local operator of the local company operates the through line, and it is so all over this country. Every town is connected up with some other telephone company and becomes an integral part of it. It is impossible to draw a line between the operatives of the trunk line or main line and the operatives of the small lines or the independent lines. It can not be done, and I believe, although I may be mistaken, that no way can be found to take over the telephone lines without taking them all over and operating them as a unit. I do not say that can not be done; of course, it can be done, but not economically and effectively. If the operation can be made more effective in the hands of the Government, which I think some Senators at least will have a doubt about, it can be done, but I doubt very much if these lines can be separated.

Now, whatever may be said about the necessity of taking over the telegraph and telephone lines, the cable lines occupy a different position, and they can not be taken over without the consent of foreign Governments, as I think I can explain. I might say in passing that no foreign nation in this war is operating its cable lines. The cable lines are operated by American companies or by French or English companies. It is possible the British Government may be operating the two German lines which it took at the beginning of the war. It disconnected those lines and connected them up with the shores of Great Britain, but, generally speaking, the lines are being operated by corporations. Of course, the countries have absolute control over them.

Now, take the question of censorship. No one is going to claim that any private corporation ought for a moment to be allowed to communicate by telegraph or by telephone or by cable with anyone in any foreign country unless every message passes through the hands of and is censored by an official of the American Government. If there is any more complete censorship that can be had than there exists to-day, of course everybody will be in favor of having it put into operation.

The American Government to-day censors every single message which goes over a cable line or a telegraph line into a foreign country, and it must do so. There is no doubt about that, and I can not see, and in fact no suggestion has been made by any Cabinet official or by anyone directly or indirectly to the committee, that a more complete censorship could take place than now exists. If it can, I should be in favor of granting the power. In fact, I might say in passing that Congress provided in the trading-with-the-enemy act as follows:

Whenever during the present war the President shall deem that the public safety demands it, he may cause to be censored, under such rules and regulations as he may from time to time establish, communications by mail, cable, radio, or other means of transmission passing between the United States and any foreign country he may from time to time specify, or which may be carried by any vessel or other means of transportation touching at any port, place, or territory of the United States and bound to or from any foreign country. Any person who willfully evades or attempts to evade the submission of any such communication to such censorship or willfully uses or attempts to use any code or other device for the purpose of concealing from such censorship the intended meaning of such communication shall be punished as provided in section 16 of this act.

Of course, it was not called to the attention of Congress when that act was passed that any other censorship was necessary, and so far as I know no censorship of local telegraph and telephone messages within this country is possible or ever has been thought of. Of course, the mail to Europe is censored, as it should be, and also the telegrams and cablegrams; in fact, I believe no code message is allowed to be sent over a cable by anyone except the Government of the United States, allied and neutral Governments.

Mr. STERLING. Will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. STERLING. I might call the attention of the Senator to the statement of Secretary Baker before the House committee, which is in line with what the Senator is stating.

Mr. KELLOGG. I shall be glad to hear it.

Mr. STERLING. He was asked the question by Mr. HAMILTON:

Just there for a moment—you are preventing messages of improper character now?

Secretary BAKER. Of plainly improper character. Or—

Said the questioner—

if it happened to be a message about which you were in doubt you would exercise your discretion in that case?

Secretary BAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, no message can be sent without being read by the same censor who would read the message if the Government owned and operated the cable line.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator know of a single instance in which that confidence has been violated, or was evidence of any such instance brought to the committee?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; and I have never heard of any complaint either of the telegraph or the telephone on the question of leaks. It is possible there has been such complaint, but the State Department or the other departments have not disclosed them. I can not, of course, speak for them.

Quite likely the President in taking over the cable lines, if he should do so, will consider all the things which I am saying to the Senate, but I do think that Senators ought to understand it and know what those conditions are before we vote upon this measure.

These cable lines—and this is an important matter to this country—run from points in the United States to points in Nova Scotia or Cape Breton or New Foundland or the French island of San Pierre, or the Portuguese Azores, and thence traverse the Atlantic to Great Britain, to France, and formerly of course, to Germany. Hence, the most vital sections of the cables, namely the Atlantic Ocean portions, are completely under the jurisdiction of the British, French, or Portuguese Governments, and none of those Governments would be likely to consent to the United States Government owning and operating a cable into their country. I do not say, of course, that the British Government would not consent; I do not say that the French Government and the Portuguese Government would not consent. I presume they would consent during the war if the United States Government thought it was necessary to take over the cable lines, but there are other Governments interested in this question of taking over the cable lines.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator does not assume that they would consent to complete control by the United States, but only such control as our present citizens or corporations would have.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course the British Government would not consent to absolute control by the United States, because under its landing contract it reserves the right to protect the British Government in time of peace as well as war. All foreign Governments will allow foreign corporations to make landings on their shores if these foreign corporations may be controlled by the Government where the landing is made without disturbing the relations between the two Governments. But no Government in time of peace will consent to a foreign Government building and operating a telegraph and telephone line within its territorial borders. So Great Britain found, although it owns all local telegraph lines, that it was inadvisable to attempt to build cable lines to foreign countries owned by the British Government or operated by the British Government, because no foreign country would permit it.

The Western Union Telegraph Co. has a line to Cuba. It is now contemplating the construction of a line from Cuba to Brazil and to other points in South America, which I believe at present it reaches over the lines of a British corporation, although I am not absolutely sure of that. The Central & South American Telegraph Co. has lines running, as I stated before, I think, from this country not only to Cuba and the Central American States but to Mexico, and on down the coast into the interior of the countries on the west coast of South America, crossing the South American Continent at Valparaiso, extending up the east coast into the interior of the countries on the east coast, and connecting with other lines of telegraphic communication.

Does anyone suppose that the South American countries are going to consent to a cable line or to a telegraph line being built in their countries and operated by the Government of the United States or being taken over and operated by the Government of the United States? Certainly not; and I do not presume that the United States Government would attempt to do so; certainly not without the consent of the Governments to be affected. I do not presume that the President would attempt to do it; but I did think that the Senate ought to know—and I presume many Senators know just as well as I do—the conditions under which these cables are held. For instance, take the concessions granted to the Central & South American Telegraph Co. by some of the Governments of South America. Take the one granted by the Government of Mexico. The concession becomes void for the following reasons:

In case this concession should be transferred to any foreign Government or State, or in case such should be admitted as partner in this enterprise.

I am informed, although I have not read the concessions, that similar clauses are in the concessions granted by all of the South American and Central American countries. That is undoubtedly true, and there is a reason for it, as I have heretofore explained. We would not for a moment consent to Great Britain building telegraph and cable lines into our country. Canada has not taken over its telegraph lines during the present war; they are operated by private companies, and for the reason that Canada knows that no censorship between individuals in the same country is going to do the Government any good, except for the purpose of detecting criminals. I understand that every telephone and telegraph company is under the direction of the secret-service agents of this Government in assisting in the discovery of crime or in the arrest of criminals.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator from Minnesota?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Assuming that the President undertook to take charge of the telegraph systems of the country, what would necessarily follow in cases where the present owners of the telegraph systems have agreements such as the Senator says they have with foreign countries? Would it not result at once in confining our whole system to our own continent because of the objections of foreign countries?

Mr. KELLOGG. Undoubtedly our concessions for cables in foreign countries might be forfeited.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. So it would practically cut the United States off from telegraphic communication with other countries?

Mr. KELLOGG. It would cut us off from owning cable lines to other countries. If the South American countries should take possession of and operate them in connection with us, we, of course, could use them, but we should lose the cable lines.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It would practically isolate us, so far as telegraph communication is concerned, unless we entered into agreements with foreign countries?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator from Minnesota has just read the franchise or the agreement between one of the telegraph companies and some of the South American Republics. I presume that similar agreements have been made with many of those countries where the Western Union or other companies are now operating.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have no doubt of it, though I can not speak from personal knowledge, because I have never examined their contracts.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly the Senator will cover the matter before he leaves that branch of it, but I desire to ask: Is it not a general principle with Governments, our own included, not to permit any other sovereignty to acquire not only coastal rights but also interior rights of property or franchises, and to confine communications of foreign Governments to those of a diplomatic or consular nature, and thereby safeguard communication between civilized powers?

Mr. KELLOGG. So far as I know, no country permits a foreign country to establish telegraph and cable lines or any other public utilities within its borders; and the cable lines of the world generally are owned by private corporations. The private corporation, of course, is under the control of the parent government where it is organized, and it is under the control of the foreign Government where it goes with its telegraph and cable lines, so that the foreign Government is protected. When an American company builds a line into its territory, the foreign Government can control the corporation, but it can not control another foreign Government, and it will not, at least in times of peace, permit anything of the kind. I do not doubt for a moment that our allies will permit anything that is necessary or which is deemed to be necessary.

Mr. Carlton promised to send to the committee copies of his contracts and the opinion of his counsel, but there has not been time for them to arrive, and I wish to say to Senators that I have not had time since this matter came up to give it thorough consideration. I am therefore simply giving the Senate for what it is worth the views that I have and the knowledge that I have acquired in years past, with what little I have acquired within the last two or three days. I think the covenant in the contract between the Anglo-American Co., which is the British corporation which leased its lines to the Western Union Co., is as follows:

The Western Union Co. will not mortgage, charge, assign, transfer, underlet, or part with the possession or beneficial ownership of, or permit to be taken in execution the premises for the time being comprised in the demise hereby made, or any part thereof; but so that this present covenant and provision shall not prevent the Western Union Co. from assigning its interest under this present lease in the said premises along with its entire undertaking, including its present and future landing system to any other responsible company: Provided, That such company shall first have entered into a deed of covenant with the Anglo Co., assuming liability for, and covenanting to perform and observe all the obligations and liabilities of, the Western Union Co. under this present lease.

And there is a clause in the landing right of these cable companies in Great Britain which gives the British Government control over them; a reservation which any self-respecting government must put in any landing right that it grants to any company. So I say that, while Great Britain undoubtedly would, if it were necessary, grant the right for our Government to take over the cable lines running from here to England, and the French Government undoubtedly might grant the same right to any lines running to France, it is not at all certain that the South American or other countries would grant such rights.

Mr. President, the extension of the cables of this country to foreign countries is one of the greatest industrial conceptions of our people. We to-day, with one unimportant exception, control every cable line extending from here to Europe, and plans are being made to extend them to the Scandinavian countries and to extend the other cable lines of the Western Union to South American countries. If, after this war, we are going to maintain that commercial supremacy that the genius and wealth of this country entitle us to maintain in the markets of the world, we shall need to push our cable lines in competition with other countries all over the world, together with control of the cable lines across the Pacific to the Orient.

When these lines were taken over by the American companies the charges were very largely reduced. Under the old conservative management of the British companies they did not believe it possible to reduce the charges on messages between here and Europe and maintain their dividends upon their properties; yet the Western Union Co. has reduced the charges so that you can send a commercial letter to-day for 5 cents a word instead of 25 cents, and they are making just as much as ever; indeed, I think they are making more. Their earnings have been largely increased, and the business men of this country have reaped the benefit of that progressive policy that American genius has brought forward.

Do we want the cable lines in this country to become Government institutions, as the private lines have been in some foreign countries? I shall have something to say upon the effectiveness of government operation and ownership of telegraph lines in foreign countries before I have finished my remarks, if I do not wear out the patience of the Senate.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. May I ask the Senator from Minnesota a question in connection with the concession for a line between here and the Republic of Mexico? As I recall what the Senator read, there was a provision that the concession should be forfeited if it were transferred to any foreign government, or if any foreign government was taken into partnership in connection with the operation of the line. Those are the two points that I caught. The question I want to ask the Senator from Minnesota is this: In his judgment, would the taking over for a limited period, and for a specific purpose, the possession of these lines for military purposes, amount to the conveyance of the concession or the admission into partnership of this Government in the sense that it would work a forfeiture under the clause which he has just read?

Mr. KELLOGG. So far as the neutral countries are concerned that are not interested in this war. I should say it would. I do not see any difference, so far as those countries are concerned, and the object they have to attain, between taking over and operating such companies temporarily, and taking them over and operating them permanently. The right which they have sought to protect is the right of their Government against any foreign Government owning a cable line in their territory. I have not had time to give this matter careful consideration, but it is a matter that should be thought of, and I would suggest that Mr. Lansing be asked whether he thinks it is wise to take over the cable lines.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, if the Senator will indulge me for just a moment, under the terms of this joint resolution, which does not provide for the taking over or even invite the President presently to take over these lines, it seems to me that the first step that would be taken by the President would be through the Department of State to confer with the diplomatic representatives of other countries, so as to bring about an understanding that the taking over for military purposes of these lines should not work a forfeiture, and that the President of the United States certainly, if confronted with the fact that a forfeiture would be worked by taking them over temporarily, would not take the cable lines, but would confine the exercise of his authority to the lines in the United States. Does it not seem that that would be the reasonable course for the Government to pursue? So far as I am concerned, I can not think that it is possible, with respect to any cable lines with which I am familiar, that we would have any difficulty in getting the consent of foreign Governments.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator think there might be any difficulty in getting the consent of Mexico and some of the South American countries?

Mr. KNOX. I do not.

Mr. KELLOGG. Of course, the suggestion of the Senator is a reasonable one. I have not suggested that the President would go ahead and take over the cable lines without the consent of foreign Governments; but why is it necessary to do that? Great Britain, France, and Italy have not found it necessary to take over and operate cable lines, because they know that they can be absolutely controlled and censored just as effectually in the hands of the corporations as they can be in the hands of the Government. If they can not be, I should say take them over, because the first thing we wish to do is to make secure the transmission of news from here to Europe and from Europe to this country.

I am simply suggesting to the Senate some of the things that should be considered before we take over these lines; and, for the benefit of those enthusiastic gentlemen who believe that the Government in times of peace can do everything better than private individuals and who believe that this is the beginning of a permanent policy, I wish to say that no foreign country will ever permit this country to own cable lines and telegraph lines within its borders, if it is a self-respecting Government. Furthermore, as the Western Union Co. and the Postal Telegraph Co. own or control by lease the ocean cables, how can the Government take over the local companies without taking over the cables, for a taking over of the Western Union and the Postal companies ipso facto takes over the cables? It is of vast importance to this country that our lines of communication shall reach the fast-developing wealth of the South American countries and shall reach the Orient, where millions of people to-day are awakening to the industrial activities of the world. I am not suggesting that the President would attempt to take over the English cable lines and operate them without obtaining the consent of the British Government, and I presume that consent would be obtained.

Now, so far as the control of the telegraph lines and of the telephone lines of this country is concerned, they probably rest upon a different basis. Undoubtedly the taking over of the telephone lines would make greater confusion and they would be more difficult to manage after their taking over than would the telegraph lines. Their number, their ramifications, and the fact that their management, especially in the case of the smaller companies, is, to a large extent, personal, undoubtedly would make it much more difficult to take over and control the telephone lines than to take over and control the telegraph lines.

So far as the telegraph lines are concerned, I say that I believe Canada has not found it necessary to take over her lines. I personally have no knowledge of any reason, military or otherwise, for taking over the telegraph lines in this country. Mr. Carlton was asked that question, and he said he did not wish to oppose the Government taking them if it was thought best; he made that very distinct and very plain; but he added that, whatever might be said about the telegraph lines, so far as the telephone lines were concerned he could conceive of no reason whatever why they should be taken over. He has no interest whatever in the telephone systems of the country. The telephone companies are entirely separate and distinct from the telegraph companies, and there is no ownership or control between them, as I understand.

Of course, everyone knows that people do not send private communications, code messages, by telephone, and it is inconceivable that the Government or anybody else uses the telephone for private messages which might have effect upon the military operations of the Government. If there are reasons why the telegraphs should be operated by the Government to prevent leaks in messages better than can be provided against by private individuals, I should be very glad if any Cabinet official, or anyone else, would give us the reasons. I thought we ought to have the head of the Signal Service, having charge of that department of the Government, before the committee; but other members of the committee thought differently.

So far as efficiency of management is concerned, unless the Government could make every employee a soldier and compel him to work and prevent him from striking, I believe everybody would admit that the management could not be more effective for the Government than it is now. I notice that Secretary Daniels has said that the Government has been compelled to build various private lines to plants and shipyards in this country, because the telegraph and telephone systems were overtaxed. I am informed that the Government has not built one single line to any plant; they have been built by the American Telegraph & Telephone Co.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator say whether those lines as to which he has just referred are operated by the Government?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think they are not, but I can not say definitely as to that. I think they are operated the same as all other lines in this country are operated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BENET in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is there any evidence in the record or in any of the hearings to indicate that the telegraph companies have shown any disinclination to construct any additional lines to the various plants referred to by the Senator when the business needs of the plants and of the Government require additional construction?

Mr. KELLOGG. There is no such evidence before the committee. I have read the testimony of Secretaries Daniels and Baker, and of Postmaster General Burleson, and I do not remember anything of that kind in their testimony; and I am informed that there has been no such disinclination. Of course, everybody realizes that the telegraph and telephone wires of the country are taxed to their limit, but the question of extension, as Mr. Carlton says, is a question of getting material. He said, "We have the money to make all the extensions and additions necessary from time to time; but it is a question of getting material." They have not asked any assistance from the Government. I only know as to what Mr. Carlton testified; I do not know as to the other companies, because they have not appeared before the committee.

Postmaster General Burleson frankly admits that he is for Government ownership of telegraph, telephone, and cable lines, and he says that every other government operates its own telegraph lines. That is true, with some exceptions.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Did not Secretary Baker make the same assertion and did not Secretary Daniels make the same assertion, namely, that they had favored Government ownership of these lines; that they hoped now there would be no limitation placed on the Government control and that it would finally merge into Government ownership?

Mr. KELLOGG. As I recall, Postmaster General Burleson did. I think his attitude is well understood by everybody in the Senate; but my recollection is that Secretary Baker said that he would place no limit as to time upon Government control, in the same way as he thought that no limit should have been placed upon the railroad control. I do not remember that he expressed himself as being in favor of Government ownership; I do not think he did. He failed to state, however, that no foreign Government operates its own cable line; he failed to state that they have found it inadvisable, and probably impossible, to construct and operate their cable lines. They control them, of course. The cable line that is now in operation from Great Britain to South America, I believe, is owned by a British corporation. I am not familiar with its organization. I have explained why I believe that it is impossible for this Government to go into the ownership of foreign cables.

It is entirely possible for us, of course, to inaugurate now a policy of Government ownership of telegraph and telephone systems. Great Britain has owned its telegraph lines since 1870; but their operation under the Government has been very unsatisfactory. The Government also owns the local telephone lines in Great Britain. The French Government owns the French telegraph and telephone lines, but their operations have been more unsatisfactory than the operations of the British lines; the operations of Italian lines, owned also by the Government, are worse than the French lines; and the Spanish lines, I think, are the worst of all. That is about the history of the government operation of telegraphs and telephones in Europe.

Did you ever try to telephone upon a French or Italian system or a Spanish system and compare it with the system of the United States? Why, in this country, where we have only 6 per cent of the population of the world, we have 65 per cent of the telephones of the world. They reach almost every home in this land, and our business and social intercourse is carried on over the telephone. The telegraph is comparatively unimportant, as compared with the telephone, in this country. As I said before, we are the inventors of the telegraph and the telephone, and no foreign government owning them has ever taken any steps in their advancement. We have been the pioneers, and all the great inventions for the perfection of the telephone and the telegraph were conceived by American minds. What has done that? American brains and ingenuity and American enterprise in the great field of commerce. You do not get inventive genius from Government clerks and Government operation. That is not an argument against Government operation in times of war if it is necessary, and I make no argument against it if it is necessary; and even if the operation would be less efficient, as I believe it would be, following the example of the railroads, I should be in favor of it if there were any reasonable ground for taking them over.

I am aware, as the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says, that this is simply a grant of power; and, as I said in the opening of my remarks, I do not wish to try to persuade Senators against giving the power or in favor of it. I do wish to state some of the conditions as they appear to me, because it is announced, as it was announced in the case of the railroads, that this is the beginning of Government ownership; and while, of course, men will differ on that subject, I, for one, am not in favor of Government ownership permanently of telegraphs, telephones, or railroads.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to have the Senator's view as to the power that will be conferred by the joint resolution. The Senator is, of course, familiar with the power sought to be exercised by the President and the Railroad Administrator under the act of 1916, before the railroad-control act was passed by Congress, wherein they attempted to exercise the power of control on the theory that while under Government control they were not subject to the laws enacted by Congress or by the States. I want to ask the Senator, if that same power should be asserted in the case of the telephones and telegraphs, whether in his opinion they would have the right, if that power did exist, as in the case of the railroads, to refuse to receive messages, and thus establish a complete censorship?

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, undoubtedly the Federal Government would have the power to take over all the telegraph and telephone lines and only send Government messages and make a complete censorship; and if that is necessary that should be done.

Mr. LENROOT. That really goes to the question whether they would have the power to discriminate as between private messages; in other words, whether they were bound as common carriers while under Government control and operation.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Government, when it takes over the telegraphs and the telephones for Government operation as a war measure, in my opinion, can do anything it pleases with them. It can discriminate or absolutely deny anybody the right to use the lines. Not for a moment do I think the Government would do it, but it has the power to do it; and I am not denying that that power is a proper power, because I am one of the men who believe that the war power is a power to do anything that is necessary to save the Nation. I do not believe, of course, that the ordinary constitutional restrictions and protections of human life and human rights and property should be set aside unless it is necessary; but if it is necessary it is an overruling and controlling power.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Of course, no one can disagree with the statement just made by the Senator from Minnesota; but I rose to ask him whether, in his judgment, the railroads would ever be turned back to their owners? I should like to ask him, in the same connection, whether, if we turn over to the Government the telegraph and telephone systems, we may ever expect that they will return to private ownership?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, in this time, when the foundations of world society are being shaken, when we are passing through a period of change unknown since the destruction of the Roman Empire, it is impossible for any man to predict what will occur in the next few years.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KELLOGG. If the Senator will allow me to complete the statement. If this war ends by the victory of the allied people over a criminal autocracy, so that nations can have a right to regulate their life as they please, and we return again to the paths of peace, I hope we shall return again to the industrial relations in that regard that existed before; but we are going back to a new world, to new conditions, and no man can tell what it will be necessary for this people to do in the next 10 years. I believe firmly that we have grown great and prosperous and advanced in civilization and in all of its arts and in education under a system of competition between man and man; that that has made the great American citizen who is to-day combating Germany; and I believe that the condition of initiative and competition should continue after the war. But whether we will take back the railroads or not I can not say, nor can I even venture an opinion.

I now yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I first want to say to the Senator that I am one of the men on this side who wholly agrees with his doctrine that when war is declared under our form of government the Commander in Chief can do anything that is necessary to preserve this Government. I have been arguing that. I have been insisting on it.

I ask the able Senator his view on the following: Such being true, assuming that to be the correct basis, does not the Senator feel that if there is a war emergency requiring the taking over of these wires, the President, in the exercise of the war power, could do it without this joint resolution, and that even if we should defeat the joint resolution the power still would inhere in him to do all the things this joint resolution authorizes, basing it on the war necessity?

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, I suppose that if the President thought the Nation was imperiled by the ownership in private hands of the telegraph line from here to New York he could send out the Army and take possession of it, as he could take possession of anything in this country as an immediate war necessity; but the Attorney General, I am informed, has given an opinion that the power does not exist without a statute; and I for one would prefer, if the President thinks it is necessary to act, and we agree with him that it may be necessary, that we should enact a statute giving him authority. I do not believe in the President exercising his undefined war power without an enabling act of Congress unless it is an overruling necessity.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. Does the Senator from Minnesota agree with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] that the President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, has these war powers at all?

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, no; I did not understand that to be the position of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. KNOX. My own judgment is that the President does not have any war powers; that he is not given any war powers by the Constitution of the United States. The war powers are vested in the Congress. The President exercises those war powers, not as Commander in Chief but as President of the United States.

As Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, of course, he is at the head of the Military Establishment; but there are no war powers vested in the Military Establishment. The war powers are vested in the Congress, and Congress vests them in the President; and the President, as the executive head of the Nation, just as he does in relation to our civil affairs, exercises these powers that the Congress confers upon him.

I am perfectly certain, so far as the Senator from Minnesota is concerned, that he agrees with me that the President, while he might physically take possession of the line, for instance, between here and New York, would not be taking it under any right he enjoys under the Constitution of the United States, and I do not think he ever contemplated or will contemplate any such action as that without the previous authority of Congress; and the fact that this joint resolution is pending here now is the best illustration of the attitude the President of the United States himself takes toward that proposition.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh, I quite agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania, if the Senator will pardon me. I was evidently misunderstood. I say undoubtedly the President, as the Commander in Chief of the Army, as a temporary expedient, might send out the Army and take possession of a telephone line or telegraph line if he thought that line was being used to communicate with an enemy, just as was done in the War of the Rebellion; but that is, you might say, a daily operation of the Army. The President, of course, exercises the war powers which Congress gives him. Congress has, perhaps, an undefined power; no man can define it entirely unless he knows the exigencies which may arise; but Congress may do what is necessary to save the Nation. Of course, Congress can not, nor can the President, destroy the Constitution. I am not one who believes that the Constitution is suspended during war. It was made for times of peace and prosperity and times of war, and it has been great enough for both.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. LEWIS. May I not ask the able Senator from Minnesota and likewise the able Senator from Pennsylvania if it is not their view that after Congress has exercised the power which they correctly infer and rightfully describe, and declares war, and creates the President of the United States, as under the Constitution, the Commander in Chief, he is then, in the conduct of that war, vested with the discretion of conducting it by such means and methods as according to his judgment are necessary for the national defense?

Mr. KELLOGG. He is vested with the discretion in the direction of the Army and the Navy in their operations; but Congress must raise the Army and the Navy, and provide for carrying on the war.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, if the Senator from Minnesota will yield to me for a moment, because I was included in the question asked by the Senator from Illinois——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. KNOX. I should like to say that I entirely agree with what the Senator from Minnesota has just said in relation to the President directing the military operations of the Government; and over those military operations we have no control whatever, except as we may control them by the means that we provide for their conduct. But we are talking now about a requisitory power. The President of the United States, in the actual conduct of war upon the field of battle or within a zone which is occupied for military operations, may, under extreme circumstances of necessity, exercise an arbitrary requisitory power in respect to your property or mine.

For instance, if a brigade of soldiers were marching from one city to another, and the soldiers or their animals needed food, and there were storehouses of food available, and no time to go through the legal operation of acquiring it by the Government, the President, through a general or colonel or any other officer in commmand—it would be the act of the President—could seize that food for the maintenance of those armies. But the President can not requisition the property of the citizen, or of the corporation created by the laws of the country, without express authority of Congress, and that authority of Congress must not only be clearly given but in the giving of the authority there must be a provision for compensation. Those requisitory powers are the powers that we have been granting him ever since war was declared, and the mere declaration of war does not enlarge in any sense the powers of the President, except as the Senator from Minnesota has just illustrated in respect to the military operations of the Army and Navy.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, when I was interrupted I was discussing the suggestions of Postmaster General Burleson, because I believe that his anxiety to take over the telephone, telegraph, and cable lines is inspired by his thorough belief that the Government should own and operate them all.

I do not think that is a consideration which should weigh with the Senate at this time. We ought not now to decide any such question of future policy for this country. We have existed for nearly a hundred years without Government operation of these public utilities. That question should be settled after the war is over. Whatever we do now should be confined to a military necessity; but as that consideration will undoubtedly affect the minds of some men who disagree with me, and on that question, of course, fair-minded men do disagree, and I am not one of those who believe that the man who holds the other opinion does not know anything about the subject, I say it may be permissible for me to make a few suggestions about the subject which Mr. Burleson testified in regard to before the House committee.

The telegraph system in this country and the telephone system in this country are the cheapest and the most efficient in the world. Compared with Great Britain, where the use of the telegraph is very general, ours is cheaper and more efficient. I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the report of a committee appointed by the British Government to look into the question of retrenchment in public expenditures, which committee made its report on the 21st of February, 1916. I read a paragraph therefrom:

> The history of the telegraphs is most unsatisfactory. They were taken over in 1870 at a cost (including capital expenditure on extensions) of £10,129,687 ($50,648,435) in the anticipation that they would yield a profit to the State. After the second year of post-office management the profits failed to cover interest on the capital outlay. Year by year the financial position has grown worse. In recent years the loss upon working has not been less than £1,000,000 ($5,000,000) a year, and this loss includes nothing for interest due to the State upon the aggregate losses of previous years.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator be kind enough to give at length the title of that document, so that I can identify it in the RECORD?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am unable to give any other information as to it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it a public document? Has it been printed in this country as a public document?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do not think it has. I take it from a pamphlet which was written by a gentleman in whom I have confidence. Of course I can not vouch for its accuracy.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I simply wanted to have means of identifying the document from which the Senator is reading, so that I could read it.

Mr. KELLOGG. This is from an open letter submitted to the Joint Committee on Interstate Commerce, which has in charge the investigation of the railroads.

From the same letter it appears that in a speech in the House of Commons on April 30, 1914, Postmaster General Hobhouse, of Great Britain, said that within the last 40 years the telegraph expenditures of the British Government exceeded the telegraph receipts by $110,000,000, not including interest on the original purchase money, nor interest on the annual losses, nor any provision for amortization. If these were included, the loss would have been $200,000,000.

I now read what purport to have been the conclusions of a committee of the Public Service Commission, who held their convention in San Francisco on October 12, 1915:

When we consider, therefore, how intimately the public welfare is bound up with an adequate development of our wire service and the deplorable consequences—from the standpoint of extent, quality, and cost of service—which have followed attempts of foreign countries to develop their wire systems by direct governmental agency; when we consider, too, that this unfortunate condition has come about despite an acknowledged superiority in point of administrative efficiency of foreign governmental machinery over our own; when we consider, finally, that an analysis of the causes underlying the strikingly inadequate character of the wire service abroad reveals governmental defects inherent in direct governmental management, but fortunately absent under a system of governmental regulation, it would seem that until such time as evidence to the contrary is adduced of a more conclusive character than that presented by the Postmaster General and his assistants it is preferable that the Government in this country continue its policy of dealing with electrical systems of communication by regulation.

Mr. President, so far as the Government ownership of telegraphs and telephones is concerned, it is not fair to compare them with the mail, and especially the telephone system. When a man sends a letter, it is sealed. There is no censorship, I believe, of local letters in this country, and we never will permit such a thing. It is contrary to the spirit of our institutions; at least, there is no legal censorship of that kind. There is, of necessity, a censorship of letters going abroad. It is a war necessity, and it is proper; but the telephone and, to a less degree, the telegraph is to a certain extent public. The telephone reaches every home, and is bound up with the intimate personal relations of the family and the individual. It is not necessary for the Government to use it for the communication of confidential messages. I believe it would be intolerable, except as a war necessity, that the telephone should be open to every Government employee of this country. I believe that the telegraph should not be so open. There are in many of the States, and there should be, the strongest penalties for disclosing private messages over the telegraph; and certainly in times of peace we do not wish any governmental authority to have access to the telephone and telegraph communications between people in this country, and it is not necessary. I have yet to have pointed out to me any censorship which any government exercises over its interior telegraphs. Why, in France, Gen. Pershing has taken possession of the telegraph lines that he uses. They are not allowed to be in French Government operation; and, of course, upon the battle fronts our Government will take possession of the telegraph that it operates in connection with its armies. But I do not know that it is necessary in this country; and as for efficiency, I doubt if we will get as efficient service under governmental control as we get under private control.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. KELLOGG. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Was there any evidence before the committee as to how the Government now, through any of its officials, has access to the dispatches which go over the telegraph lines of the country?

Mr. KELLOGG. There was no evidence at all on the subject before the committee. There was no evidence before the committee except Mr. Carlton's testimony. I think any supervision of the telegraph messages that I have heard of is entirely proper and only in the interest of the country. I have no knowledge of anything else. There was no testimony taken on the subject.

Everyone knows that in sending messages the telegraphers are valuable according to their efficiency. It is not an ordinary employment. It needs keenness, promptness, ability, and spirit to make a good telegraph operator. The enterprise of the telegraph operators of this country, I believe, is commendable. I do not believe that ordinarily such service is given by Government clerks. There is something in the very nature of Government service that seems to take away the enterprise of the individual, the hope of promotion. But if there is any reason why the telegraph should be controlled by the Government or if there is any emergency liable to arise, of course, no one will raise any objection.

I am not going to discuss the conflict between the Western Union Co. and certain officials of the Commercial Telegraphers' Union. We carried on this war for a year and three months without any suggestion from anybody that there was a necessity for taking over the telegraph lines when suddenly the Commercial Telegraphers' Association threatened a strike on the Western Union lines. Of course, everybody knows that the continuity of telegraph service and telephone service and railroad service is doubly important in time of war, and the Government can not for a moment permit the suspension, and I do not believe that there ever was or is to-day any danger of a strike among the telegraph operators of the country. The so-called Commercial Telegraphers' Association, Mr. Carlton testified, had not one single member on the lines of the Western Union Co., and it only has about 2,500 members altogether in this country and Canada, and I think he said about 1,200 in this country. I take that statement also from a pamphlet which was furnished by him to the committee.

The reason why there was no strike on the Western Union line was that there was nobody to strike, because this association had no membership on that line. I have no doubt every Senator has received dozens of messages from telegraphers all over the country that they have no idea of striking.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. Furthermore, on Sunday afternoon this Commercial Telegraphers' Association called a meeting of the 40,000 telegraphers of the Western Union Co. and asked them to attend, in order to signify their intention of joining the Commercial Telegraphers' Association, and only 56 of them signified their willingness out of over 40,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know whether the Senator heard my telegram this morning, but 300 operators and employees in the Western Union in Detroit did say they had no intention of striking and were entirely satisfied and want no change from private ownership to Government ownership.

Mr. KELLOGG. I have heard various messages read in the Senate to that effect, and received many of them myself, and I have received messages from other trade associations to the same effect.

Mr. Carlton testified that the Western Union had no objection to unions and thousands of their employees belong to the American Railway and Telegraph Association—if that is the correct name—and many of their linemen belong to associations; but he did say that they were not willing for this association, whose sole object is a strike, to work upon their lines; that more than 78 per cent of their employees are now organized, or have organized a union; that he believes in unions and the right of a union to bargain. I believe that every labor man has the same right to combine that capital has to combine, and I believe they are entitled to enjoy the benefits of combined bargaining with their employers to better their working conditions, their wages, and hours of labor.

I never have, and am not now, opposed to reasonable labor unions. I am opposed to the I. W. W., which is a union of destruction and not of construction. I do not believe that there would have been or will be a strike of telegraphers upon the wire lines of this country. I have never known an occasion to arise where from all over the country came the voice of the labor men as has come from these telegraphers from every part of the land, that they are loyal to the Government and loyal to their employers and intend to do everything they can to win this war.

I shall not, as I said before, attempt to review this controversy. Evidently the public call for a strike upon the Western Union line was a bluff and there was no possibility of any such strike. Of course this Government is not going to permit a strike on the railroads or on the telegraph lines or on the telephone lines.

Mr. President, it is easy in time of war and under the guise of war power to take steps into untried fields which may be of great injury to the public. I agree with what the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] said. We did not hesitate to call upon the splendid young men of this land to fight the battles upon the bloodstained fields of Europe. We are not going to hesitate to conscript wealth, public utilities, capital, labor, everything that is necessary for the war and to make our cause a success. Let us not, however, under the guise of war necessity attempt to equalize all human endeavor and to socialize this land. I am not a socialist. The theory and dreams of socialism have been tried over and over again since the dawn of civilization and have always proved a failure. Socialism is at the base of the Government to-day in Russia, but I believe the great counteracting power against socialism in Russia will be the landowning of Russia. I believe that the great counteracting power in this land against the impracticable dreams of socialism will be the landowning farmer. He has nothing in common with the socialist. Let us not under the guise of war try to socialize all industries. Let us win the war with the instruments we have and leave the theories of socialism to be settled afterwards.

RECESS.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, July 12, 1918, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 12, 1918.

(Legislative day of Thursday, July 11, 1918.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	New	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Henderson	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Benet	Johnson, Cal.	Overman	Smoot
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Penrose	Sterling
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Pittman	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Poindexter	Swanson
Colt	Kendrick	Pomerene	Thomas
Culberson	Kenyon	Ransdell	Thompson
Curtis	Knox	Reed	Trammell
Dillingham	Lenroot	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Fernald	Lewis	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Fletcher	McCumber	Sherman	Walsh
France	McKellar	Shields	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Myers	Simmons	Wolcott
Hale	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. THOMAS. I announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] on necessary personal business. I ask to have this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I announce that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is necessarily absent on account of illness in his family. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] is detained by illness, that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is necessarily absent, and that the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] are detained on public business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

MOVEMENTS OF SOLDIERS' MAIL (S. DOC. NO. 266).

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, certain information relative to the movements of the mails to and from our troops and auxiliaries abroad, which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

S. 4444. An act to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China;

H. R. 12100. An act to amend the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States, and for other purposes"; and

H. R. 12229. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

PETITIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from delegates to a convention held in Chicago, Ill., representing 55,000 employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., praying that action be deferred on the measure for the control of telegraph lines, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of sundry Lithuanians of Newark, N. J., pledging support to the Government, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the School of Methods of the New Jersey Sunday School Association, of Asbury Park, N. J., favoring national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WARREN presented resolutions adopted by Local Union No. 2700, United Mine Workers of America, of Crosby, Wyo., favoring the repeal of the present zone system of postage rates on second-class mail matter, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4824) for the relief of Jacob Kestner; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 4825) granting a pension to James M. Gibson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—S. J. BATCHELDER.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers accompanying the bill S. 1396, Sixty-fifth Congress, second session, granting a pension to S. J. Batchelder, no adverse report having been made thereon.

NATIONAL HOLIDAY OF FRANCE.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution this morning. I offer it after a conference with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations. If the resolution be not acted upon at once, it will be out of season. The purpose of the resolution is to extend felicitations to the Republic of France upon its great anniversary, which is to be celebrated on Sunday next. I ask that the resolution be read, and I shall then ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 283) was read, as follows:

Whereas the people and Government of France have expressed their friendship for the United States by celebrating our national holiday, the Fourth of July; and

Whereas the 14th of July, France's national holiday, is similar in meaning to our Fourth of July; and

Whereas it is fitting that the American people should express their appreciation for the celebration in France of our Independence Day and their admiration for the sublime courage with which the people of France have for nearly four years defended the liberties of the world, and give voice to the unalterable determination of America to support the common cause of free nations to the utmost limits of our resources: Now, therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States of America hereby tenders the fraternal greetings of the American people to the people and Government of France, and urges all citizens of the United States to observe the national holiday of France, the 14th of July, as a mark of special regard for our ally.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of State be directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the Government of the French Republic.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was unanimously agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had, on the 11th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

S. 3798. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4193. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4542. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor.

Mr. POMERENE obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask what is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], which will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 7, strike out the word "telephone" and the comma, and after the word "thereof," in line 8, insert "except any telegraph or telephone lines owned, controlled, or operated by a press bureau or press association."

Mr. REED. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, I desire to send to the desk and have read an amendment which I have prepared which, I think, covers the subject matter the Senator from Indiana has embraced in his amendment, and perhaps he would be willing to accept it as a substitute. I should like to have it read.

Mr. WATSON. That would be very agreeable to me, I will say to the Senator from Missouri, but the Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. REED. I will ask to have it read in the time of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I have no objection to having the proposed amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the joint resolution add the following:

The right and privilege of the people and the press, substantially as heretofore enjoyed, to the unrestricted use of said utilities upon fair and equitable terms, shall not be interfered with, except that the governmental business may, when deemed necessary, be given precedence over all other business and rules may be adopted to prevent the use of said utilities for any disloyal purpose.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think Senators are familiar with the position I took in favor of hearings upon this the pending joint resolution, and I believe I ought to ask your indulgence for a few minutes to state briefly my reasons for my attitude.

We had, by accident perhaps rather than by design, before the committee one witness, the president of the Western Union Telegraph Co. He gave us some very interesting information. I think I have some idea of the extent of the business of the Western Union Co. in its various ramifications. Suffice it to say very briefly that this company has issued $100,000,000 of stock; its assets are valued at $200,000,000; it has a bonded indebtedness of about $30,000,000; its annual paid messages amount to 150,000,000 in number; the president of the company estimated that there were about 10 handlings to each message, or, in other words, about 1,500,000,000 handlings annually by this one company; that it controlled or transacted about 80 per cent of the telegraph business of the country; that it had about 300,000 miles of poles; that it had 1,500,000 miles of wire; and that it has leases of a number of trans-Atlantic cables reaching almost to the four corners of the earth. I think I am safe in saying that except the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who has had some unusual opportunities of investigating this subject during his professional career, there was not a member of the committee who had any notion that the taking over of this telegraph system would probably operate as a cancellation of these leases of the cable lines.

I do not know yet whether the position of the president of the company with respect to the legal rights and obligations of these various companies is correct or not. We were to have been furnished by him with copies of some of these contracts, and we were promised the opinion of the general counsel of that company bearing upon that subject. These documents have not yet come, and such hearings as we have had, for reasons which it is not necessary to go into now, have not yet become available for Senators.

Those who favored an immediate report upon the joint resolution of the Senate without any hearings excused themselves for not having hearings because of the fact that it merely confers authority upon the President of the United States to take over the telegraph and telephone lines, marine cables, and radio systems, and at no time requires him to do it. That is true. It is suggested that the President desires this authority. That is true. But, Mr. President, no one has presumed to say that the President expects this authority in the phraseology contained in the joint resolution. No one has presumed to say that the President wanted this authority yesterday or to-day or to-morrow. No one has presumed to suggest that he does not want the advice and the counsel of the United States Senate and of the Congress upon this subject. No one has presumed to suggest that he wanted this railroaded through without legitimate hearings of all the interests involved. No one would even insult the President by making a suggestion of that kind.

Now, what is the situation? We are expected to take over the Western Union Telegraph Co., with its property and business, and with employees numbering 56,000 to 60,000, to say nothing of the Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. or the countless telephone companies in the United States.

I am bold enough to assert that the Senators on that committee and the Senators in this body do not at the present time comprehend all of the ramifications of these great systems. I have never heard that a legislator would be injured if he had some facts before him on which to base a conclusion as to what he ought to do. I have never discovered in the seven years I have been in the Senate that I was less able to come to a conclusion after I had full information on a subject than if I had no information on the subject.

I want to say very frankly to Senators that if I am compelled to vote to-day I shall vote for this joint resolution, but I shall not vote with the confidence in the conclusion to which I have been driven that I would have had if I had been permitted to hear all the parties interested in the subject or their representatives, and I do not believe that I am very different from other Senators.

I confess when this question first came up I believed that the immediate cause which led to the suggestion of this legislation was the fact that there was a threatened strike, and I was amazed when I heard from the president of the company that there was not a single employee of his company within his knowledge who belonged to the union that had threatened to strike. We were informed that last Sunday when a call was issued for the employees who were interested in the strike to appear only 56 out of the some 56,000 to 60,000 employees of the Western Union Co. responded to the call.

Mr. President, if the conditions were such in this country that the means of communication were seriously threatened, I would be willing to vote on the instant not only to give authority to take over the telegraph and telephone lines, but I would go further and by legislative act direct the President to take them over; but no one has even suggested that there is any necessity for immediate or hasty action upon this subject. Let me read merely a sentence from the testimony of the Postmaster General in the hearings before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. These hearings have only become available within the last day or two. I read from page 37:

I do not know, as I said a moment ago, what is in the womb of the future, and neither do you gentlemen. There may never be a necessity that the President exercise the power conferred on him by this resolution, but if the necessity should arise and the Congress had failed to give authority to him, you would never cease to upbraid yourselves.

That is true. Senators will note that it is not claimed that a necessity exists for the exercise of this power now, or even in the near future.

The Congress of the United States is now in session, and if an occasion arose whereby it became necessary for the President to take over the lines of intercommunication, the Senate and House would both, I dare say, pass this resolution before the sun set; but now, having the authority of a member of the Cabinet to the effect that there is no urgent necessity for precipitate action, what ought we to do?

Reference has been made to the fact that we conferred upon the President authority to take over the railroads. That is true; but we did that in the closing hours of the session of Congress, and it was impossible at that time for Congress to know or ascertain what, if anything, might occur to justify the taking over of the railways during the vacation or recess. The very first thing that was done on the reconvening of Congress after the holidays, after the President took control of the railroads, was to take up legislation prescribing the terms and conditions upon which we should hold and operate the railroads, and the rules of compensation. We also provided for the classification of the railroads with respect to their earning capacity; we provided how rates should be increased, if that became necessary. We gave to the President the power, first, to initiate rates, with a right of review by the Interstate Commerce Commission. We attempted to define what should be the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission and what should be the jurisdiction of State commissions. We found that it was necessary, when it came to litigation, to lay down rules prescribing what should be the jurisdiction of the Federal courts and what should be the jurisdiction of the State courts. For all these purposes we found it desirable to provide.

More than that, we found that the financial condition of many of the railroads was such that it became absolutely necessary that the Government should furnish them with financial assistance. We had long and continuous hearings upon the subject, and we evolved legislation which, in certain respects, is satisfactory and in certain other respects is very unsatisfactory.

Suppose that we should take over the telegraph and telephone lines, how are they to be managed and controlled? By what agencies? How are we to pay the employees? Suppose it becomes necessary to give financial assistance, how is it to be done? If rates are to be changed, how shall it be done and who shall be clothed with the authority? Would not Senators be interested in having some information on this subject?

I sought to get a little information from the president of the Western Union Telegraph Co., and I ascertained that, so far as that particular company was concerned, they now have a bonded debt of $30,000,000 which had yet many years to run; so I do not imagine that there will be any difficulty in financing the Western Union Telegraph Company. But suppose that in the wisdom of the President it should become necessary to extend the capacity of this company, how should the additional lines be constructed, at whose expense—that of the Government or that of the company? If additional lines are to be constructed, what compensation should be allowed for that purpose? Are not these matters of interest to Senators?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that if duplicate lines are to be abolished some provision should be made for compensation.

Mr. POMERENE. Well, Mr. President, that is true. I do not anticipate, however, that many of these lines would be abolished, because, as I understand, their capacity it now pretty sorely taxed.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It is sorely taxed; but there is duplication.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And that duplication has been encouraged by law and by administration.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator, of course, is aware of the fact that the enabling act with reference to the railroads was passed in 1916?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And when the Government assumed control for an enlarged purpose, we then had legislation looking toward the particulars to which the Senator is now referring.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President, I understand——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will permit me, this is simply an enabling act. If it should transpire that further legislation is necessary in order to preserve the public welfare in this emergency, doubtless we would adopt the same procedure we did with reference to the railroads. I do not consider that this joint resolution gives the President the power absolutely to reject and destroy any telegraph or telephone line, but to assume control. It does not give him the power to confiscate, but even if it did there is an ample remedy provided in the joint resolution, for the parties thus injured may go to the courts.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, we have gone over that repeatedly in the course of this discussion. What the Senator says is true; we can to-morrow or the day following take up another bill or joint resolution, but I have seen no reason why we should make two bites of this cherry. Why not attend to this duty now?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. I will suggest also that this joint resolution makes provision for compensation; it gives the President power to pay what he pleases, but if he can not agree with the companies every one of them can bring suit against the United States Government, and nobody knows what the liabilities of this Government will be.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes, Mr. President; and we thought it very wise in the railroad legislation to provide some means of compensation and to lay down the rules which were to control the President or his assistants in determining what the compensation should be.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to interrupt him further?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Was not that at the instance of the Government itself?

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. We did not initiate it; the Government itself asked for the additional legislation.

Mr. POMERENE. The President suggested it, and the Congress took it up, and we occupied perhaps four or five weeks in holding hearings before the committee in order to determine what we should do, and we were several weeks longer in the discussion of the subject in the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But we did not, if the Senator will allow me, have any hearings on the enabling act. It was simply when we undertook to enlarge the scope of the authority that hearings were held.

Mr. POMERENE. I understand that; but we found after we passed the enabling act that there were many respects in which that enabling act was deficient and it became absolutely necessary to have further legislation. Now, while we have this matter before us, I think that Senators could vote with infinitely more satisfaction upon this subject, either for or against it, if they knew what the modus operandi later on was to be.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, when the enabling act was passed in relation to the railroads nobody dreamed that it gave power to take over all the railroads in the United States. It simply provided for the taking over of railroads necessary for the transportation of Government supplies and material; and it was passed with a view to the situation on the Mexican border and nothing else.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me further, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Minnesota that the same thing is true of the present legislation. Suppose the President had seen fit to confine himself simply to a comparatively small use of the railroads for military purposes. Then the subsequent legislation would not have been necessary. Suppose he simply finds it necessary to take over a few telegraph and telephone lines for military purposes in this emergency. Then no subsequent legislation will be necessary. I think, however, he will pursue the same course with reference to this subject that he did in regard to the railroads if he finds that it is necessary to have additional legislation in order to attain the object sought.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I understand perfectly what the attitude of the chairman of the committee is with respect to this question. I said a moment ago that if there were any special reason why this joint resolution should be passed to-day it would be passed unanimously by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. President, I have referred briefly to the extent of the Western Union system; I have also referred to the Postal Telegraph-Cable Co.; but I have said nothing about the telephone companies of the great Bell system, the great independent systems, and many thousands of subsidiary telephone companies. It has been stated in my presence that in the State of Iowa alone there are 3,000 of the smaller lines; in the State of Minnesota there are 1,700; and I know there are countless numbers of them in my own State. I dare say that there are as many in that State as there are in the State of Iowa. There are more than 7,000,000 instruments in daily service in the United States.

Mr. KELLOGG. More than 7,000,000, I presume the Senator means, in the Bell system.

Mr. POMERENE. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. There are over 12,000,000 in all.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; more than 7,000,000 in the Bell company and more than 5,000,000 in the independent lines. I am glad to have the correction.

To what extent will the Government take these lines over? Has anyone studied the question? Does anyone know what we ought to do in the matter? Does anyone at this moment know what the President ought to do in the matter? If we were to have hearings and they were to be made available, as they would be, for the Cabinet and the President themselves, might not the information which we would glean from the hearings be of service to them? In my humble judgment the Interstate Commerce Committee of the Senate owed it to itself to investigate this subject; it owed it to the Senate; it owed it to the owning companies; it owed a duty to the employees of these companies; it owed a duty to the President himself.

I happen to know that a portion of the Bell system which operates in my State for several years has been in the hands of receivers. I do not know for what reason, whether it be financial or otherwise, and I do not care, so far as the purpose of my argument is concerned; but Senators know that many of the smaller telephone companies are embarrassed financially and that they do or may need financial assistance—when or to what extent, I do not know. Is the Government expecting to take over all of these companies not knowing what their financial condition is, not knowing what their relationship is to the public or to commercial business? If so, how are they to be operated and how will our obligations be met?

Mr. President, I have differed from a good many of my colleagues on the extent to which we should take control of the so-called short-line railroads. Other Senators know quite as well as I do that many of those railroads have as their chief asset bales of bonds and stocks which they have issued. Some of them run from nowhere, through nowhere, to nowhere. We have had the officials of some of those companies come here and urge upon the President and the Director General of Railroads to take over these railroads, whether they were of any public necessity or not.

In other words, they wanted to unload their liabilities upon the Government—that is the situation—and are we at the present time to have no thought of this condition, in so far as it may apply to the telephone companies or to the telegraph companies?

Suppose we hear from the general counsel of the Western Union Telegraph Co. that if we were to attempt to take over the cable lines, ipso facto the lease which the Western Union Co. has on these lines would be avoided; would not the Congress feel that it was in duty bound to make some regulation upon that subject?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WOLCOTT in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. POMERENE. I do.

Mr. WATSON. What is the Senator's opinion about that?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have not seen the contract. The president of the Western Union expressed the belief that it might avoid those leases if the Government should take them over; but he said he was not a lawyer, and he would not presume to give the committee an opinion upon the subject. He promised to furnish us with a copy of the provisions of the contracts bearing upon this question and to furnish the opinion of their counsel as to the effect upon them of the action of the Government in taking them over. We have not yet received either the contracts or the opinion of counsel.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. KELLOGG. The Senator is entirely correct. There has not been time.

Mr. POMERENE. Certainly not.

Mr. KELLOGG. The committee, I believe, has been informed that the contracts have been mailed; but, as we know, they are probably bulky, and, in view of the fact that the counsel may not have had time to formulate an opinion, I asked one of the counsel of the Western Union if, in his opinion, the taking over of the telegraph companies, which would take over the cables, would forfeit the contracts. He said that, in view of this provision in the lease which I read into my speech yesterday, in his opinion the only way in which the Government could operate the cables would be by consent of the British Government.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there is just one other thought to which I wish to refer. Some reference was made on yesterday, and at different times in conversation with certain Senators, to the claim that it was very necessary, from a military standpoint, that we should have possession of all of these offices, so that we might censor the telegraph companies and the telephone companies. Of course, we all recognize the fact that if treasonable messages are being sent across these lines, the Government ought to know what they are.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. They do know.

Mr. POMERENE. And for the most part they do know; at least, they know when it comes to cable messages. I am not so sure as to the rest.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator that they do censor certain messages, I understand. I have here the statement of Secretary Baker before the House committee. He says that they exclude messages which are plainly objectionable.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not had the opportunity to read over his testimony.

Mr. GORE. I think it is on pages 7 and 8 of the Secretary's statement.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. I think Secretary Baker's testimony refers to cable messages, or any messages going out of the country.

Mr. POMERENE. I thought so.

Mr. KELLOGG. No foreign country in this war censors its domestic conversations and domestic telegrams or thinks of doing such a thing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, they keep a very close lookout on these messages. I know of an instance where a message was sent from San Diego to New York, and within an hour from the time it was left at the telegraph office a special agent of the Government was at the home of the sender to ask why he sent it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am quite sure that our Secret Service are very diligent in the performance of their duties in that behalf. I do not intend to discuss the question of censorship, except to make one or two observations. One is this: If it came to conferring authority upon any branch of the Government to censor all private messages, whether by telephone or telegraph, I think Senators would hesitate a long time before they would do that. At the same time, we know that by not censoring all the Government sometimes suffers; but if we were to censor all infinite loss and damage might be done to business men and business interests throughout the country. Public sentiment does not approve an extreme system of espionage, and will not do it even in war. But for the purpose of proving to the Senate that the purpose of taking over these lines, if they are taken over, is not censorship, I want to read a few lines from the testimony of the Postmaster General before the House committee. I read on page 37:

Mr. ESCH. Of course, you have the power now under the trading-with-the-enemy act, so far as mail, telegrams, or wireless messages going outside of the country or coming in are concerned. You have got the power now.

Postmaster General BURLESON. Undoubtedly, as to mails to and from foreign countries, and it is being exercised to the best of our ability.

Mr. ESCH. But you do not think that the director general, then, of communication would have the power of censorship unless Congress specifically granted it?

Postmaster General BURLESON. Undoubtedly he would not.

Mr. ESCH. So that that feature of the operation would be left to subsequent legislation, as would other matters.

Postmaster General BURLESON. You probably would never legislate on that subject, because I do not believe now and have never believed that there was a necessity for censorship over domestic mails.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KELLOGG. I should like the Senator to explain, if the object of censorship is to prevent the communication inside of the country of improper news, how it is possible to censor telephone messages and telegrams unless the mails are censored, too?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senate is not at all interested in that subject. We ought not to have any hearings, and I think it would be unwise even to take the time of the Senate to discuss that subject. We might learn too much about it if we had hearings.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, before the Senator dismisses the subject, however, I want him to know that it is the opinion of a great many Senators that the mail is being opened and is being censored.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there may be special instances of that, but I doubt whether it is done to any very serious extent.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to assure the Senator from Michigan, as I likewise am pleased to inform the Senator from Ohio, that my information from the Postmaster General himself, and from other heads of the Government, is that there have been two instances where some letters have been opened by some subordinates in the Postmaster General's Department under a mistaken idea of their duty. Promptly these men were dismissed from the service; and from that time on, I can assure the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Ohio, it is given out that there has not been an instance of an attempt at censorship of domestic mails.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, I am quite sure that has not been the policy of the Post Office Department or of any of the departments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I did not say that it was the policy of the department, but instances have come to my knowledge. The Senator from Illinois confirms that impression to a limited extent, and I think he could even go further and say that the officials who were guilty of opening these letters were dismissed from the service. Now, that is all right; but there is nevertheless a very widespread opinion that there is meddlesomeness in the affairs of the people by the Post Office Department that is unwarranted.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, there is another thought that I want to submit. On yesterday I presented to the Senate the substance of two telegrams I had received, one representing 600 telegraph operators at Cincinnati, another representing probably 75 telegraph operators at Columbus, and this morning I received another from the telegraph operators in Toledo—I do not know their number—asking that they be given the privilege of appearing before this committee and presenting their views. Other Senators on yesterday, and perhaps the day before, presented many other telegrams, or the substance of many other telegrams, from the four corners of this country, asking for this privilege. I believe that those who are financially interested feel that they ought to have been heard and to be allowed to make their suggestions in the event that these systems are to be taken over. I have not heard anyone—and I say it to their credit—whether he is employer or employee, who is going to object if the Government says "We must take them over for the protection of the country," and I admire their position. I do not believe that any patriotic citizen would object to the Government taking over any piece of property that he might have if by so doing it would contribute to the success of this war. And now, before the situation becomes acute, if it ever does become acute, why is not this the time when we should perfect a piece of legislation which would meet all of the contingencies that may arise, not only for the protection of the people whose property is taken, but for the guidance of the President and the Cabinet as well?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, will the Senator allow an interruption?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does not the Senator know that for some time it has been the disposition of the present Postmaster General to take over these telephone and telegraph lines; that it is one of his favorite principles and theories of government that the Post Office Department should exercise control and direction over these means of communication?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I hardly think that fairly represents the attitude of the Postmaster General. It is true that it is his judgment, as I gather from reading his testimony, that he believes that the Government should own and operate both the telegraph and the telephone systems as integral parts of the post-office system; but he very frankly says in his testimony that whatever may be his predilections on that subject they ought not to have any controlling influence at this time. In other words, his position is that questions of that kind should be determined during normal times, and not during a period of war; but he bases his judgment that this authority should be given wholly on the ground of what he believes to be military necessity.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the Senator from Ohio, who is always fair and illuminating in what he says, must admit that we have been confronted with propositions based upon an apparent or claimed war necessity which would not have stood the test of the sound sense of Congress at any other time than the present; and I think—and I say it respectfully, and mean no discourtesy to that department—that the genesis of this proposition is at the Post Office Department, where they hope, under the present exigency, to give it force and effect. I think they are making use of this extraordinary situation to get control of these great arteries and avenues of communication.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, it is perhaps true that we have at times been pretty free in conferring authority. I have no objection to that. I think the Congress has had absolute confidence in the President and the military and naval powers of the country, and it is their desire to aid wherever they can. I think that is the prevailing disposition generally on both sides of the Chamber, and we are all glad to see it. I do not believe that it is going to be abused. I do not believe that the conferring of this authority would be abused. I know it would not be intentionally abused by the President or by any of his appointees, so far as we know them; and I have infinite confidence in his ability, his patriotism, and his integrity.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I have.

Mr. POMERENE. But we all know that the President will not be able to take up this subject and give attention to all of its details. He must trust some one else; and for that reason it has seemed to me that we would be able to present a better measure to the Senate if we had had full hearings upon the subject; and even if we should decide, as a result of those hearings, not to change a word in the joint resolution, we could all come to our colleagues on the floor of the Senate and give to them the reasons for our recommendations.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I want to say in this connection that Secretary Baker, in his statement before the House committee, admitted that the taking over of the telegraph and telephone lines is not a present military necessity. He said that it might in the future become a military necessity. This seems to be the theory upon which this legislation is founded—that by some future chance or peradventure the military necessity might arise. They seem to have "dipped into the future" farther than "human eye could see." Of course, if this were a real military necessity, or if it were an immediate military necessity, there would not be any division of views as to this legislation. Nobody, in or out of Congress, would object to taking over these facilities if it were a proved and demonstrated or actual military necessity.

I thank the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not care to occupy the floor further. I simply want to conclude, as I stated in the beginning of my remarks, that if I am compelled to vote on this joint resolution I shall vote for it, but at the same time I shall never feel that the committee has done its duty either by the Senate or by the Chief Executive if it refuses to grant reasonable hearings to the interested parties, whether they represent the company, its employees, or the public.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, without some hearings before the committee to guide me to a different conclusion, I can see no good reason for the passage of the joint resolution. My understanding is not closed on the question, and if I could have the evidence presented to me showing the necessity as a war measure for the adoption of the joint resolution I would very cheerfully vote for it. By no vote of mine would I withhold from the Executive any necessary power to strengthen his hands in not only an executive and civilian matter, but as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in all the matters relating to military or naval affairs. In civilian matters until that showing is made I shall assume that there is no adequate reason for the passage of the joint resolution or any domestic situation presented. There is good reason why such a joint resolution ought not to pass if it be applied to our domestic affairs.

Mr. President, it will control and close at the will of subordinates all the means of communicating information from person to person. The mails are already in the hands of a public officer vested with very complete power. The telegraph service is now in that condition where it may be controlled absolutely by the Government, if necessary, in the transmission of any intelligence that affects the conduct of the war. No messages can go to any foreign country without the censorship and the absolute prohibition by the Government if necessary. We are therefore protected under present powers of the Government.

If, however, we add to that the telephone system of the country, then the control or exclusion, at the will of a bureau, in our domestic affairs of the means of transmission of intelligence is complete.

I shall assume that all the wireless or radio stations can properly, if they connect with any of the messages transmitted to foreign Governments or to citizens or subjects of a foreign Government, and all cable lines, be controlled under existing law. So it relates entirely to the effect of the joint resolution upon our domestic affairs.

The public press is intimately connected with the powers exercised under this joint resolution as proposed. All the wires now serving the great newspapers in the metropolitan centers are thereby put in the hands of a public censor.

Who is the public censor at this time? One person, as a matter of fact, is now that authority. His name is Creel. The fittest synopsis that ever headed any written composition I have read is a certain translation of Don Quixote. It reads:

Chapter XLI. That gives an account of things which you will know when you have read it.

A more luminous heading for the activities of the Committee on Public Information could not be devised. After you have read what Mr. Creel said before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations you certainly have an account of things in about 167 pages. The prodigal expenditure of $1,250,000 is, however, the only tangible thing that remains. It is a tangled plexus of divisions and pay roll and temperaments. Sometimes a good horse is so overtrained that he breaks down in the race. A business is frequently organized to death. I have known corporations all of whose majority shareholders were salaried officers. There were so many executives and managers that nobody was left to work, and it perished from congestion of the pay roll. The Committee on Public Information, referred to in the House hearings, is suffering from a similar malady. It has multiplied itself until it possesses a vast plurality of functions.

No one would expect the exuberant imagination of Chairman Creel to be pent up in one place. It must have a vent, or he would lapse into another sophomoric period referred to in these hearings and discharge 10,000 words a day, as he used to do at Denver when he was in his normal condition.

The committee is subdivided under the testimony in this House hearing into 21 branches, ranging all the way from film service to elocution. Creel is the parent trunk, which forks so near the ground that no saw timber can be gotten out of it.

Moving pictures and professors of elocution synchronize themselves in voice and action. Speakers are classified into a four-minute squad and those who run an oratorical platform marathon. The four-minute recruits are taken into a hall where there is no pitiless publicity and instructed by the elocutionist furnished by Creel how to deliver a strong message. Their gestures and inflections are shorn of their barbaric crudeness and pronunciation reduced to current vernacular. The rough protuberances are trimmed down and suitable predigested intellectual nutriment provided for those lacking sufficient mental vigor to assimilate raw ideas. The long-distance men are generally hardened miscreants, I ought to explain, who scorn instruction even from Creel himself. They comprise some who can talk for hours without obtaining any permanent relief. Among the latter, however, were some who had a chronic propensity to part their names and hair in the middle and wear lavender spats in the corn belt.

Mr. Creel suffered intensely from their refusal to harmonize themselves with the western landscape. He furnished them, without avail, an inspiration and a model in himself. They scorned it. They were all together at the Capitol, where he communicated to them the genuine afflatus, which can come only from personal contact and the overmastering impulse generated by the presence of such an audience. Nothing short of a sublimated psychology, linked with an unprecedented cerebral agitation, could have stimulated him to such fervent thanks for our unpreparedness for war.

The division into four-minute men and those who can stand alone on the platform for an hour or more without help from the official elocutionist is a feat that rises to Alpine heights of a genius that is unique, novel, and sui generis in the annals of appropriations. Each squad has a foreman. It would not look half so imposing to have them all in one oratorical brigade. The four-minute performers need no cloture rule. The end of their elocutionary reel is automatic. The hardened platform veteran with a pitcher of ice water and practically an inexhaustible supply of throat lozenges needs a foreman to protect the audience.

The moving-picture feature is most industriously developed. It has also developed that one moving-picture concern is given a monopoly of war films in the United States. A scenario department assimilates the output and does the sign writing. Mr. Creel and his dramatic genius censor it so the public will consume the proper article. The idea is to create healthful mental conditions among the populace. This could not be done, of course, by letting every concern have the film indiscriminately. Patriotism is promoted by farming the films out to one company. It simplifies bookkeeping to do so. There is a business-management department who would simply be worked to death if they had to deal with more than one moving-picture outfit.

Mr. Creel has noted with deep anxiety evidences of degeneracy among the canaille. They clamor for love scenes that would make Don Juan look like a Sunday school hero. A distinct yearning among the proletariat for sensational matter of a pronounced chrome yellow has nearly prostrated Mr. Creel. Nothing has so disturbed him save his discovery a few years ago that the origin of our Federal Constitution was so disreputable as to make him think it ought to be abolished by a direct-action, automatic, pure democracy, similar to the one Russia is now enjoying.

June 13, 1918, in the House Appropriations Subcommittee hearings, which I have, on page 151, he still thought so. An opportunity for reform was given him by indulgent members of the committee, but he declined to embrace it and avowed heartily that he still was of the same opinion. The statute of limitations he has set up against offenses seven years old has not yet run against his June, 1918, statement. Anyhow, whether it has or not, the conversion of Creel into an essential pillar of stable government makes the resurrection of Lazarus seem commonplace. His early enthusiams have been modified but not his views on the Constitution. He has only modified his forms of expression, he says.

Mr. Creel now attributes the morbid appetite for highly seasoned news to a reprehensible type of journalism to which he contributed 10,000 words daily before he was regenerated. The style was bizarre. It aimed at shock rather than sense. If it were respectable it was miserable. It can not be denatured without being defunct, decent without being dead. Its brilliancy is the glow of putrescence. It shines with the fitful glimmer of decay like the phosphorescence of a deceased fish. There is in such a newspaper no binding force for civil society. In peace it is a pestilence, in war a skulking menace. The dissolution of the ties of stable government is its purpose and revolution its goal. It grazes the line between the masterpieces of Ben Jonson's Joe Miller and Tobias Smollett's Adventures of an Atom. It is specious and insincere, shallow and coarse, and bears the same relation to the legitimate public press that Rabelais does to decent literature, save the French humorist is redeemed with wit and philosophy and the yellow lepers of journalism have neither. Such illegitimate offspring of a perverted press instinctively revile stability and the great foundation stones of institutional liberty quarried by the solemn experience of mankind from the elemental deeps of eternal things. It wages continual war with common sense and rails at laws, human or divine. All the safeguards embodied in the sheltering headlands of civil liberty are denounced as chains on the common people. Such a newspaper is a daily rattle of imaginary chains. The editor who can clank the chains the loudest is paid the highest. Trotzky is the finished product of that school, and his government the seething gulf into which the American people are invited to plunge.

Creel now appears as the great luminary to scatter the darkness he and his kind have created. The aboriginal freebooters of debased journalism are rebuking the spirits they called from the vasty deep at $1,250,000 annually. They remind me of the thrifty genius who kept a kennel of wolves in the brush and bred them so he could collect the bounty paid by the county on their scalps. The bane and antidote are discovered on the same pay roll, presided over by a saffron swashbuckler of former days. A mental discharge of 10,000 words per working day in the rarefied atmosphere of the Rocky Mountains exhilarated the imagination and brought on a verbal looseness which makes it imprudent for Mr. Creel to appear before an audience. We have his own words for it in this hearing, to wit, of the condition of affairs in Denver when he wrote the editorials inserted in the RECORD by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. I quote:

Nobody then spoke in whispers, nobody spoke in conversational tones—we screamed.

The press enlightened its readers with tropical epithets and red headlines. It was a waste of ink to use an adjective less than the superlative. He vows on page 160 of his evidence:

Never again will they get me upon a public platform.

Once a short time ago he made a speech in a New York church. Excitement, or the novelty of being within a sacred edifice, or a relapse into his natural temperamental exaggeration, made him refer to Congress as slum scenery. His July 4, 1917, U-boat chapter was not an amazing yarn; it was a psychological extravagance. It is so explained in cold type. We marvel at his self-restraint. Was there not an opportunity to blow up the Kaiser's whole fleet of marine pests! He restrained himself to one submarine and strewing the sea with wreckage and oil so one could have something for his imagination to work on.

What a high-horsepower expression is worth is shown by details generated in his superheated fancy. Aboard a warship accompanying the fleet was a prosaic Associated Press correspondent who was unable to see or to hear any of the engagement. He persisted in wiring that the whole story was a myth. It was, to be euphonious about it, an artistic elaboration, is the way it was explained in the hearings.

The apocryphal tale that the Government could have put a rifle in the hands of every soldier as he entered camp emanated from the same wellspring of veracity who would have charge of the distribution of all human information if this joint resolution were passed in its present form. This careful regard of the Government caused the men to be drilled with broomsticks as a safety-first caution. They were then unaccustomed to firearms.

Then a flier on aeroplane news absorbed his next effort. He it was who inserted in the thrilling serial dubbed the "Official Bulletin," and edited by the official bullhead, language which led the unsophisticated citizen to believe that hundreds of aircraft had gone to France and that thousands more would be ready in a few days; that the whole European sky was to be blackened with them in a little while. He was told by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and other members of the Committee on Military Affairs of the gap between fact and fiction before it was published, and yet it appeared, and Mr. Creel laid it on an individual named Strunsky; I find that thoughtful precaution in the hearings, as I go back to that time and peruse it. One thing it has netted us, Mr. President, at least, it has enriched our vocabulary with a new word. Munchausen is stale and vapid. Strunsky tunes things up with a refreshing variety that falls upon the ear with indescribable euphony. Creel admitted before the committee that one airplane had actually been shipped. This was so much better foundation for most of his information than usual that the committee and everybody else felt relieved that he got so near the truth.

Then came the Von Igel revelations, which were given him to prepare copy for publication. His handiwork relating to Holland brought an instant and indignant protest from the Netherlands minister in this city. Diplomatic matters in an undigested state, it is noticeable, have not been referred to him since. Great creative ability and a high-voltage imagination do not impress the department as promotive of international harmony among free peoples.

Sensational matter does not appeal to him, he avers. He is so tied to humdrum routine that anything lurid causes him infinite torture. He says himself that any trashy or stupid stuff is at once relegated to the garbage can. I wonder how he himself keeps out of it? He knows it at sight as a qualified expert, having produced it himself in prodigious quantities before he was named by the President as conservator of the free press of our country.

Mr. Creel said six years ago the American voter was a Russian serf. The Senate sits in despotism and we are the despots. Those are things stated by a public officer, whose power it is proposed to increase prodigiously by the passage of such a resolution as this. The Supreme Court is a tyrant. The law is an autocrat winking at criminals in high places. The President is helpless. The executive office must have aroused the sympathy of Congress for it has delegated most of its power to that department. It would hand over the rest of it if the Constitution were not an obstacle. That document is, he said, worn out and ought to be abolished by having every court decision on unconstitutional acts of Congress or States referred to a vote of the people. The Constitution in this simple way could be amended every 90 days. All public officers were to be subject to recall on a 3 per cent petition. Instead of being present in our seats most of us would be home answering the 3 per cent petition demand and justifying our right to hold our seats longer. Elections would be going on all the time. It would intensify the people's interest in public affairs and create civic enthusiasm. No adjective under the superlative degree would be permitted by the press censor. Campaign extravagances would be promoted by chronic excitement. Hysteria would become a regular occupation and temperament or a "state of mind" excuse anything.

Mr. Creel says:

Morality is of small account and intellectual endeavor is now so little a paying proposition that only a fool will work at it.

This explains Creel's appointment and most of his pay roll. He further illuminates us by saying America is "a race of commercial sharks willing to devour one another."

Our Government was framed behind locked doors by rich men who despised the masses, to preserve aristocratic privilege. The whole scheme was a conspiracy against the people to rivet chains on their necks. They were implored by Creel six years ago to rise and smash this insufferable tyranny. If it were true then, it is true now. If it were false then, it is unspeakably vicious and depraved now. A man who will say it now is a civic leper, and under recently enacted laws a potential felon. The only mitigation offered is that it is campaign extravagance, local temperament, and sophomoric periods. He regrets his phrasing, and modified his form of expression. It was too hectic for lower altitudes than Denver. Instead of screaming, conversational tones and a more didactic style are now recommended; maybe the official elocutionist did some good. A milder pitch and denatured epithets do not purge him of principles which he avers stoutly he still believes. It is impossible to resist the conviction that, if Creel were not on the pay roll, he would be going out of one vociferous spasm into another, emitting 10,000 words of crimson balderdash per day or be in the custody of the Department of Justice.

The senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] called my attention to the most singular composition ever produced from official sources. It had escaped my attention. The Senate is indebted to him for my comment on it.

The latest exploit of this public functionary is a special feature service article July 7, 1918. From proof sheets we learn it was sent out by the committee on pitiless publicity, or, rather, public information. The style and familiar nausea remind a western man from the Wabash region of overindulgence in pawpaws. It identifies unmistakably the toadeater whence it came. There is no use in having anybody's name to it. The subject matter and style identify it completely. The subject is the Secretary of War. His wearing apparel, his gait, how his brain functions, his manner of saying "yes" or "no," of making a complete tour of the brown davenports lining the wall of his outer office, giving to each occupant a succinct judicial answer, are minutely sketched. Without warning the startling information that he thinks clearly under all circumstances and is never ambiguous is hurtled out to an astonished world.

He selects his words fastidiously, shading his meaning like one of the old masters mixed his colors. The reader's head buzzes when he is told the Secretary can keep three or four stories told him by as many men up in his dome all at one time. Instinctively we think of the juggler who entranced our boyish attention by keeping up a gorgeous maze of whirling balls with no perceptible effort, except a fixed smile. Suddenly he appears mingling with ambassadors, the wise, the good, fair forms, and hoary seers; he turns aside in the twinkling of an eye to meditate, while contractors hang in midair and profiteers wildly clutch their pocketbooks in deafening silence. "Yes" or "No" comes with a decisive ring in his voice, and hundreds of millions of dollars gush from the Public Treasury on his nod. Then the earth temporarily resumes its customary revolution. Five stenographers then rush in. He dictates to nearly all of them at once. Others linger in hailing distance as a reserve if, perchance, some of the overworked functionaries should drop dead. Immense bundles of documents of state appear, in which he immerses himself, lost in a profound vacuum of sublimated thought. The shorthanders flee madly from the incarnated human tempest, waving their notebooks ominously.

Now the landscape fades away in a haze of tobacco smoke. Gradually the scene reveals a briar-root pipe, with the Secretary of War attached, curled up in a deep, soft armchair, reading his Theocritus and Juvenal or a biography of Tom Johnson or a work on 3-cent fares. From this deep dream of peace this overripe Boswell blazes the film with Baker's trip to war-swept France. We are permitted to gaze upon the greatest Secretary of War the world ever saw. Stanton struggles dimly into view, merely as a basis of comparison, to enable our staggering mentality to gain a last look of Baker walking serene on the summit of inaccessible grandeur before we lapse into unconsciousness. The peerless strategist and warrior finishes the moving theater by remaining for hours in the trenches and dugouts in mortal peril from bursting shell and scattering shrapnel. Here the dazed audience disperses.

In the consuming major portion of the scene I forgot the prose prologue of "Round the Clock with Baker," as this horrible phantasmagoria of adulation is called. Here it is—let me give it for the benefit of the Senate, for fear that it might escape in "the wreck of matter and the crush of worlds." I shall now quote literally. Perish the base thought that I could improve on the original:

"There he goes now," remarked one of the office force who sit working in the room outside Secretary Baker's office. "There he goes, in his Palm Beach suit, with that little old soft hat on his head. Just as friendly and natural. Nothing pompous about him. I should say not. Just as easy and democratic as an old shoe!"

Mr. President, after enduring this from Creel, the terrors of a Hun invasion are considerably mitigated. We await our fate with calmness and fortitude. Nothing can be worse on either side of the grave. It has almost converted me into a Universalist—hell has nothing like this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please preserve the proper decorum.

Mr. SHERMAN. There are eight other members of the Cabinet; this is treatment for only one.

Reason will topple from its throne if other members of the Cabinet are to have anatomical charts of their cerebral cavities made with a moving-picture show of their wardrobes, headgear, and lingual activities. It will even create jealously, I fear, on the part of my colleague [Mr. LEWIS] to be left out.

This is published at public expense and sent out by the millions of copies to the public. It is composed by a man drawing $8,000 a year from the Government to spend some of his time at least compounding such ineffable hogwash.

O judgment! Thou art fled to brutish beasts,
And men have lost their reason.

It seems as if we were returning to the days when Marc Antony orated over the lifeless remains of the mighty Julius.

We read in St. Matthew—

Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth.

This is the basis of a rich heritage by Congress, for a meeker body never had hope spring eternal in its faithful bosom. Even before the war it hearkened to the Executive with some alacrity. Now, with wings as swift as meditation or a reformer seeking the pay roll, it sweeps to do daily obeisance and receive the blue prints of legislation from on high.

If it were not for the imperative mandates of the Constitution, the great elemental powers of Government, of taxation and appropriation, with the power to raise and support armies, would be surrendered. The domestic peril to republican government by an ignoble abdication by Congress of its chartered powers is second only to the German Empire. Legislative discretion, if not extinct, is so dormant as to resemble death.

In this lamentable condition, Congress is stigmatized as a slum by a public officer created by an Executive order and paid by an appropriation made by the body he traduces. This swollen rakehelly of depraved newspaperdom regrets his revealed contempt only when asking further appropriations to continue his insufferable arrogance, and escapes unscathed. I deem it my duty, therefore, to preserve in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD my opinion of the whole proceedings.

Abysmal humiliation can not go to greater depths, nor departmental snobbery rise to such dizzy heights of insolence in future years. Each can go no further in either direction. After this any servile deputy candle snuffer is at liberty to revile us at pleasure, any gangrened egotist afflicted with an ingrowing conceit may hereafter spurn Congress, and demand appropriations to feed him, with the complacent assurance that precedent now justifies anything.

With these preliminary remarks upon the joint resolution, I wish now to say that the employees more immediately concerned are almost to a man, in the Western Union, opposed to this procedure without being permitted to be heard.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I would not on any account interrupt the discourse of the Senator; but if he is leaving the heights to discuss matters that are down on the common level of business affairs, I wanted to add to his statement in regard to the kind of information that is being sent out a very brief chapter which I read from the testimony taken by the subcommittee on aeroplanes of the Senate Military Affairs Committee on yesterday.

Mr. SHERMAN. I shall be very glad to have it. It is new, and not yet accessible.

Mr. REED. The witness was Mr. Woodhouse, secretary of the Aero Club of America. He was testifying in response to a question asked by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN], and was discussing the question of the number of American machines at the front at a given time, and the misinformation that had been sent to the public. Upon that question, in continuing his remarks, he said:

I may state that I have a positive point from which we can discuss your question. That is, when Secretary Baker went to France, at that time a statement was issued about the number of airplanes there. The first report of that kind that reached us came from the Paris Herald, and it said, "Secretary Baker yesterday saw 1,000 American monoplanes and biplanes in flight." Well, now, a few weeks passed by, and then the photographs of those American monoplanes and biplanes arrived here, and they were issued by Mr. Creel's committee to carry out the report of Secretary Baker having seen 1,000 airplanes, biplanes and monoplanes. The photographs given out by Mr. Creel's committee showed some French training Nieuport biplanes and some monoplanes that are commonly called penguins, because they do not fly and do not leave the ground except for a few feet, and, of course, we were all disappointed with the evidence.

Senator REED. You say that the photographs by Mr. Creel showed this type of plane, but the ordinary layman—that is, the man who knew nothing about airplanes—could not tell the difference between those and fighting planes?

Mr. WOODHOUSE. He would not know the difference. Of course, you appreciate that perhaps a very enthusiastic newspaper man receiving the report that the Secretary had seen them—and the Secretary was there in the photograph with a great many others, including Gen. Pershing—that probably this newspaper man, hearing that he had seen 1,000 airplanes, might presume he meant battle planes, and changed it. Perhaps, being enthusiastic and wanting to make a good story, he said battle planes instead of just saying 1,000 training machines. I am taking this for granted and have nothing to base it on.

Senator REED. You say there were photographs of these penguins and these training planes which were sent out by Mr. Creel. How do you know they were sent out by Mr. Creel?

Mr. WOODHOUSE. I received them as editor of the Aerial Age, a weekly, and Flying, a monthly; and we received them and paid for them.

Now, Mr. President, the Senate may not know what a "penguin" is. It is a little contrivance that looks like an aeroplane, but it will not fly at all. It is made for amateurs to begin practicing with, and it runs on the ground on two wheels, but has wings and a motor. It may rise three or four feet from the ground and alight immediately. The French have these in great numbers for amateur training; and it would appear from the testimony that this kind of contrivance, and some practice planes—no battle planes at all—were gotten together and photographed with the Secretary of War, and then that Mr. Creel deliberately sent out those photographs to the press of this country with the information that America had 1,000 American fighting planes upon the front; and so they have been, I think, shown in the picture shows of the country. At least, I have seen some pictures that, as my recollection serves me, must have been reproductions of this particular picture.

Mr. President, I thought that that fact, while it does not do anything except create a background for the very witty and very keen satire of the Senator, nevertheless, being a fact, might be a contribution.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thank the Senator for furnishing this information. It does lend great strength to the conditions and conduct referred to. These practice planes, the Senator states, are for amateurs, and doubtless that is the way this misinformation occurred—one amateur against another. When it comes to dealing with facts, the gentleman who was writing about it is an amateur; and so he became mixed with the amateur planes, and the rest of it followed as a matter of course. He ought to have investigated a little further and gotten the entire condition, and then, perhaps, the public would have been relieved of this misinformation.

These employees who have written are entitled to a hearing. There are something like 50,000 of them now on the pay roll of the Western Union. I shall make my explanation as brief as possible, and I wish to occupy less than an hour; so that if Senators have any duties elsewhere, it will probably give them an opportunity to attend to those duties and return here by the time the quorum call is had.

I have some hundreds of telegrams, resolutions, and letters from the employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. I shall not read them, unless I can not get them into the RECORD any other way.

I have one dated July 9, 1918, from Frank H. Daley, one of my constituents. He has been a telegraph operator for 26 years. He has had two breaks in the service. He went out on a strike in 1907 for eight months, and the other time he left the service for the purpose of bettering his condition in another occupation. This shows that he is not at all averse to the view that a member of a union or anybody else has a right to strike or quit. He says he has not heard—and he is still in the service of the Western Union—of one instance where any of the employees were dissatisfied or had any grievance. He says:

I know that conditions at the present time are far above those of previous years, and there are very few men, if any at all, who belong to the Commercial Telegraphers' Union. We are receiving higher salaries, two weeks' vacation every year with full pay, a 3 per cent bonus every six months and an extra bonus in October, sick benefits, and pension.

I have a letter in connection with the pension question from W. F. Coleman, dated July 2, in which he refers to the pension question, and inquires whether, in the event this joint resolution passes, it will jeopardize the $23 monthly pension to which he is entitled, having been an employee of the company for over 33 years.

Mr. Daley says he does not understand why the Government wishes to take over the lines. He says that there is no grievance; that he knows of no one in the service who is disloyal. It is intimated in some of the correspondence, and here and there a statement is made in the somewhat short investigation that has been had, that the Government was not safe with the service in private hands. On domestic matters I trust that the Government, even if this joint resolution passes in its present form, will not undertake to censor or supervise every message that goes from sender to receiver. If it be a matter of communication with foreign countries, the power exists now, without additional legislation. I feel, and so do the men who send me these communications, that these statements made in regard to the danger of the Government with the service in private hands are a reflection upon the loyalty of men who are ready to give 24 hours a day service, if needed, and within the limits of their ability to keep it up, in everything consistent with their lives and health. There has been no intimation that any treason or disloyalty has been found in the telegraph operators of any of the systems of this country.

I have a communication, dated July 9, from Mr. Prichard. He makes the inquiry, if the telegraph and telephone lines are taken over under this joint resolution, whether, as soon as the Government gets the lines, or a little while afterwards, there will be an increase of 25 per cent in rates. He asks that because he finds, in paying freight on live stock, that he is called upon for a 25 per cent increase, resulting, as he figures, from Government control or operation.

From C. C. Bowers, an operator in Chicago, I have a communication protesting against this hasty action and saying:

I protest against the odium cast on me and my associates that we would attempt to interfere with Government communications during war by striking. I am confident this represents the opinion of 99 per cent of my coworkers.

If an opportunity had been given to these men to be heard before the committee or for us to place their communications in printed hearings, this time need not have been taken on the floor of the Senate.

A telegram sent to the President on July 6 is signed by 240 employees and is a preliminary to the organization of 1,500 who a few days later passed resolutions asking that hearings be had. All of them are operators in the city of Chicago and my constituents.

I have further, from a great many individuals, similar sentiments expressed. I have only taken a few that are typical of several hundred. I have a letter saying that the operators pay for these messages out of their own pockets, so that there can be no question about the influence of their employers in their action.

I have a series of telegrams saying that the statement that the operators are influenced by their employer, the Western Union, to send these communications is wholly without foundation, and repeating that they pay for these messages out of their own pockets and that the communications are upon their own motion.

I have—and I shall not refer to them more than by this brief comment—the reports of the Postmaster General from 1913 to 1917, inclusive. The present occupant of that office, Mr. Burleson, in each one of those reports has recommended that the Government take over the telegraph and telephone lines. In the report of June 30, 1917, or of the period ending on that day, on page 79, is his recommendation, which is similar in sentiment and in verbiage to all of the others made by the same official and by the same person. I quote now:

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES.

The Postmaster General has recommended in previous reports that Congress seriously consider the question of declaring a Government monopoly over all utilities for the transmission of intelligence, and that steps be taken as soon as possible to make these utilities a part of the Postal Establishment. The principle of Government ownership and control of the telegraphs and telephones is not only sound but practical, and finds its greatest strength in the Constitution. That these utilities should be made a part of the Postal Establishment has been the opinion of practically all Postmasters General of the United States, who have held that the welfare of the Nation will be largely contributed to by the fullest utilization of these services by the people. This result can be accomplished only when they are made a part of the Postal Service and operated solely with a view to serving the public and not of making a profit.

In Alaska the telegraph and cable service is under the control of the War Department. As the reasons why it should be under the control of that department no longer exist, the Secretary of War has recommended its transfer to this department.

Recent developments have made it all the more imperative that Government ownership of the telegraphs and telephones should no longer be delayed, and action by Congress in this matter is again urgently recommended.

Mr. Burleson comes before the committee not with an open mind but with an already preconceived judgment that forecloses any investigation. He says that he does not know of any immediate emergency requiring the Government to take these lines, but that we do not know what the future contains. There will be future sessions of Congress here. Congress will not end its labors when it recesses or adjourns. It is a body whose activities and power are coeval with the Republic. It can be convened in 24 hours, even if it were a final adjournment. It is always open to the Executive to assemble it in special session. We have had extra sessions called here several times. The mere fact that Congress might not be able to foresee the future and provide for all emergencies is no reason for lodging vast, undefined powers in the hands of the Executive.

The part of the Postmaster General's testimony read by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] expresses his viewpoint precisely, and I shall not repeat it.

If we leave the telegraph lines for a moment to consider the telephone investments and enterprises in this country, there are stronger reasons of a private nature applying against the passage of the joint resolution. In round figures $2,000,000,000 is the property valuation of the telephone companies of this country. More than 8,000 individual companies are found. The American Telephone & Telegraph Co., which is the holding company of the Bell telephone, contrary to what the public generally thinks, totals in valuation but a little more than one-third of the entire telephone properties of the country. There are numerous smaller companies, small compared with the Bell system, companies of from $100,000 capital up to $5,000,000. They are doing in the aggregate an immense business.

The Mississippi Valley Telephone Co. is a comparatively small company, and yet it serves in northern and northwestern Illinois and in eastern Iowa a great number of subscribers at a reasonable price. Its lines or its interchangeable service to other States are carried across the district within the limitations and regulations of interstate commerce. Why should this company or why should any other company of that kind be taken over and be put into the hands of the Federal authorities? It is said for the good of the service; the Government can do everything so much better than anybody else, than private enterprise. I read an article from Frank Crane, who formerly was my pastor in the Methodist Church:

In a very fine and loyal spirit the public and the railway officials have tried to adjust themselves to the action of the Government in taking over the railroads.

This is an intimation of what will happen if the vast telephone system of the country is taken over. Forty million daily messages is the record of the telephone service in the United States, and it means everything to every Senator, to his family, to his neighbors, constituents, and everybody else. To continue:

It's anything to win the war. "The Government," said Ogden Armour when war was declared, "can have Armour & Co. The Government can have J. Ogden Armour. The Government can have any man or group of men in our organization. No exemption will be claimed."

And that has been the commendable attitude of big business throughout the country, and of the people generally.

We are willing to do without sleeping cars, dining cars, and chair cars if it means licking the Germans, just as we gladly dispense with wheat, meat, and diamond necklaces. But—

I had to travel the other day on the crack railway of the United States. I went to the ticket office and had to stand in line for half an hour before I could get a clerk to ask a question. The clerical force was entirely inadequate.

When I reached the clerk I found I was at the wrong place. He snapped at me, too. Although my only offense was a desire to spend some money for a ticket, I felt as if I were up before a police magistrate for stealing chickens.

I went to another waiting line and stood 30 minutes more. I bought a ticket. Then I paid a tax on it. Then another tax for riding in a Pullman. Then a Pullman ticket. Then a tax on that. Five wallops they gave me.

I pardon the expression on the part of the doctor of divinity because by that time he was feeling somewhat tropical.

They had refused to reserve a berth for me by telephone. They refused to reserve a berth from a distant city to another point by telegraph.

I don't object. They didn't take all my money. I had enough left to buy a 30-cent meal in the diner for $1.80 and a quarter to help pay the porter's wages.

But if Czar McAdoo would kindly issue a ukase to all railroad clerks and herders of the public asking them to deal gently with the common people, who are imbued with the desire to contribute money to the roads, and remind them that dead hens lay no eggs and instruct them to administer a little laughing gas of courtesy when they extract our dollars it would help some.

Honest, I'm no pro-German. I am not a bolshevik. I'm just bruised. I'll take my punishment, if it's necessary. But why keep on pounding a man when he's down?

Says B. C. Forbes in his magazine:

"The abolition of ticket offices at convenient points, the cancellation of old-time privileges such as the return and refund of unused Pullman tickets, the lopping off of passenger trains, the curtailment of sleeping accommodations, the overcrowding of trains—all this will save money for the new railroad overlords, but the public will have to foot the bill, not only financially, but at the cost of time, temper, convenience, and efficiency. So far the Government-controlled railroading has not tended to whet the public's attitude for the Government ownership of railroads. The attitude of many railway employees toward the traveling public has undergone a distinct and regrettable, but perhaps not unnatural, change. Already there is noticeable the proverbial haughtiness of Government officials. The men now feel that their former bosses are no longer bosses and that they need not be overcareful how they act."

FRANK CRANE.

I had occasion a month or so ago in a union station to inquire at the information bureau for some needed knowledge of train service. I made the inquiry from a gentleman who did not appear to be overworked. He had a healthy look upon his face, the proper relation of avoirdupois to his height, and I saw no evidences of nervous prostration. I asked him if he could tell me when train No. so-and-so, named on my Pullman ticket, left. He said, "The same time, sir, it always does." I was a stranger in that region. I informed him I was not a regular habitué of the depot and was asking for information to guide myself accordingly, as I should like, if possible, to have time for a meal. He said, "You ought to know when the train leaves. That is posted up." I said it might have changed. He said, "The change would be noted." He said, "Go over there on the wall and read it," pointing me to the other side of the depot. In the waiting room I found at last, after due search, a train sheet in a small oak-board frame, and I read it there, and found the time of my train. I went back. I said, "I thank you for your courtesy." I said, "I wish you to understand, though, that I think you are a—" blankety-blank. Here the quotation will cease. He said, "I am a Government officer, and such language is not permitted." I said, "I will give you some more, because I am a Government officer myself," and it is the first time I ever referred to myself as such. I said, "I am a Government officer myself, and I will outrank you, and you listen to what I say," and I proceeded to say more. I do not want to repeat that experience if I can help it, but the fact is the insolence of some of these small martinets who sit at the head of bureaus is transmitted to the railway service.

What is the object of the telephone and the telegraph so far as the domestic affairs of this country are involved and the railways? Their object is to serve the public needing the service. But the idea seems to be now that people exist for the benefit of the railways, to be herded about, to be insulted by some insolent petty official, to have an inferior service, to be charged two prices. The people do not exist for these institutions; they were built and are run to accommodate the general public.

Everybody prior to the war who came back from England could recite to you their difficulties with the use of a public telegraph and the use of a public telephone. First, the rates in this country are lower than they are in England. I know they referred to the 10 words in a message, and to show that is lower when reduced to our currency than our 25-cent charge for 200 miles transmission, but when you add to it the fact that they charge you for the blank telegram, that they charge you for the address, and charge you for the signature, and charge you for the name of the hotel or the number of your street, and where you may be found hereafter, it costs more in that country for telegraphing the same distance than in the United States, where all that service is free.

Therefore, Mr. President, I think it is very material to inquire if these telephones are taken over under this joint resolution what will be the condition of things afterwards. There are no telephones extending across the sea. The only interstate service or interforeign service would be across the border in Mexico or into the Canadian country. In Canada I apprehend there will be no difference that would arise. Possibly in Mexico there would be, as there is some unfriendly sentiment existing in that country, but that is easily a matter to be controlled at the border in the respective offices where messages stop and where all the transmission can be properly censored.

I have heard in the sum total no adequate reason why telephones should be taken over. I anticipate, Mr. President, it is a part of the general drift among a certain school of thought. These emergencies are made the excuse for putting into operation and making experiment stations out of these mighty enterprises that have been developed by the individual initiative of the American people. They are to be taken under the guise of war necessities and used thereafter as an argument when the war ends to continue the plan of Government ownership and operation.

England tried it. In 1866 the Government first proposed the purchase of British telegraph lines, and about 1870, after negotiations that lasted between three and four years, they were taken. This author says that there has been during 39 years of operation a deficit that nets an enormous sum of pounds sterling. I am reading from page 233 of Guyot's volume entitled "Where and Why Public Ownership Has Failed." I only refer to this as one of the late current authorities touching the tendency toward universal Government ownership, which only heralds in or becomes the threshold of the socialistic state.

The book is written by a Frenchman and is a very comprehensive review of the countries in Europe trying public ownership of these utilities of various kinds. It analyzes with a keen line of reasoning between cause and effect the great variety of undertakings that have failed. It analyzes, too, the service. It has discovered a complaint which is unique of its kind, the first time I have seen the phrase coined out of a dead language. He speaks of laboraphobia. That is a complaint which seems to have developed principally in countries adopting the public ownership of these large utilities. On page 324 I read the following:

Not only is the work to be gotten out of a national or municipal employee or laborer below par; he has also all sorts of resources for reducing it to a still lower grade. Among others we find the disease which has been called "laboraphobia."

Among the municipal employees of the city of Paris the number of sick days have been increased, as follows: From 1896, when an account of these absences was begun, to 1908, according to statistics of the bureau of public highways, the number of hours of work has decreased from 13,458,817 hours to 12,992,718 hours, or a difference of 466,099 hours. The number of hours of absence on account of illness has risen from 556,440 to 1,056,464, or a difference of 500,024.

The same professional malady has raged with intensity among the employees of the Government railways, according to the report of P. Baudin on the supplementary credits of the Government railways for the month of July, 1912. Here is the effect of the measure granting full pay to employees reported ill: In 1909 the number of sick days was 474,000; in 1911 it had risen to 656,000, or an increase of 182,000 sick days in two years. Out of 67,967 employees, 36,816, or 54 per cent, were rendered incapable of work on account of illness—

More than half of them on the pay rolls disabled from rendering the Government any service—

Again, while only a part of the employees were enjoying these hours of leisure, it was, of course, necessary to increase the effective force by 7,440 units, representing 15,539,900 francs of added expense.

The author says:

The employees of the Western Railway [of France] cherished the most extraordinary delusions concerning what they were going to get out of its seizure by the State.

That is what some of our employees think. They have delusions of that kind, and I do not know certainly whether they are delusions. The delusion is that finally we will wake up and the taxpayer will be paying the bill. It does not make any difference about what the employee does, finally it must come out of the Treasury.

One department head remarked to one of the dispossessed private owners: "I have had only the pleasantest relations with you; nevertheless I can not hide from you the fact that I am enchanted with this purchase, because my power of appointment will be thereby doubled.

There have been, to sum up all the chapters read, where they have taken over the private industry, a shortening of hours which in some cases is proper, and I would, so far as I am concerned, always be favorable to reasonable hours—a shortening of hours, a raising of wages, an addition to the pay roll, multiplying and elaborating regulations for the division of labor, so that one employee does but one thing. If he signs checks, he does nothing but sign checks; he has to have somebody else to take the stopper out of the ink bottle and fill it up. With all this multitude of elaborations the natural result is a vastly increased expenditure. Then unless an increased charge is made for the service or the commodity there must be inevitable bankruptcy. If there be an increase in the charge, then the general public is exploited and made to pay the bill for a lesser group of people.

Taxation ought to be for the benefit of all, not of a class. Therefore inevitably these enterprises taken over by the Government and run, following the experience of 35 years in Europe of some large concerns, inevitably drift to the condition where the whole of the public is taxed for the benefit of a certain group that are in a minority but active and persistent in their claims.

Mr. President, we find by looking at the number of men employed in the telephone service, and the number of companies engaged in giving that service and furnishing the basis of organization, a good service given to the general public, a reasonable charge, and to my mind this measure, even if it should be passed, ought to pass with an amendment striking out the telephones.

There are leading into this city a number of telegraph wires serving newspapers. They are press wires and have been leased, and the use has become necessary to that particular newspaper enterprise. What will be done with these nobody knows. It thereby puts in the hands of Mr. Burleson and Mr. Creel power over every newspaper in this country not only to censor them but to control them absolutely, because when you take away their wires from them you take away the general news-gathering ability of the papers. That ought not to be permitted for a moment. If this joint resolution is needed to promote war purposes, it ought to be confined strictly to war activities. All our great domestic affairs, all the newspapers that are served by private or leased wires or owned wires, all the telephone service and the domestic telegraph service ought to be so arranged as not to be affected by this joint resolution.

I have now taken all the time, Mr. President, that I desired, and I will ask leave to print without reading the communications to which I have referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Without objection, the request of the Senator from Illinois will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., July 6, 1918.

Hon. L. Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The following message has been sent to the President, and we would appreciate very much your assistance in maintaining our present status with the Western Union Telegraph Co. The undersigned operating employees of the Chicago office of the Western Union Telegraph Co. repudiate the assertions of Mr. Konenkamp that he is acting for us or in any way representing the employees of this company. The Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America has no representative whatever in this office, and his statement that he will call 25,000 telegraphers out on strike on July 8 is without foundation.

The employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. are with you in the prosecution of this war to a finish, and we refuse to be a party to any obstruction. This sentiment prevails among the telegraph fraternity throughout the entire country.

The plans for the formation of an association composed only of Western Union employees now under way has our united support. There will be no interruption of telegraph service next Monday if the Western Union employees can have their way.

Believe us we are with you to win the war, and we know our services contribute something toward doing so. We repudiate anyone who challenges our loyalty or impugns the honesty of our purpose.

Signed by 239 operating employees, Western Union Co., Chicago.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 9, 1918.

Senator LAWRENCE SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: As I am a constituent of your district, also an employee of the Western Union Telegraph Co., with a record of 26 years' service, with two breaks, and one of them being out on a strike in 1907 for eight months and the other for leaving the service for one year to better myself.

This statement to show that it can not be said that I am a strike breaker and would not stand up for my rights as an American citizen. For the last 15 years, at St. Louis and Chicago, I have been in an official capacity of some kind, and at the present writing I am in charge of the southern circuits, which include all Washington wires, and therefore can speak from actual experience as to what my instructions are regarding the handling of all Government business, also what the feeling of the employees is in this office. I have not heard of one instance where any of them were dissatisfied or had any grievance, and know that conditions at the present time are far above those of previous years, and there are very few men, if any at all, who belong to the Commercial Telegraphers' Union.

We are receiving higher salaries, two weeks' vacation every year with full pay, a 3 per cent bonus every six months and an extra bonus in October, sick benefits, and pension.

Furthermore, I don't see why the Government wishes to take over the telegraph lines because the company will not deal with an outsider. As a rule, the higher officials nearly know how many of their employees are lined up and what strength such organization has, and Mr. Carlton, knowing that very few men belong to this organization, takes the stand of not treating with them but will meet any committee of employees, individually or collectively, if they have a grievance. I could not at the present time—neither would I, even if I had any grievance—go out on a strike while the country is at war and my son, Frank H. Daley, who is in France, fighting with Company A, One hundred and twenty-eighth Infantry Regiment, and there are many, many more who feel the same way in regard to this matter at the present time, and believe their duty is to their country and those at the front, and any move in the direction to hamper the Government in any shape or form is aiding the enemy and an injury to those who are at the firing line, whether it is a relative or not.

I also wish to state that this letter is written unknown to anyone but myself, and, being from this district, I feel it my duty to apprise you of the actual facts as they exist, and can assure you there is no need of any action to take over the lines by the Government, as we will now organize an association of our own to take up any grievance that may arise in the future, but always bearing in mind our duty to the country first, last, and all the time, and especially more so when at war. I furthermore wish to deny an article in the papers claiming that I or others had to sign those papers and petitions which were sent to Washington. The Plant employees sent one without the knowledge of any official, and myself, being in that department, also indorsed the same.

If there should at any time an occasion arise that you would want to know something of a more definite nature on this situation, I will be glad to furnish same to you, and hope you will call on me.

Yours, truly,

FRANK J. DALEY,
2912 Broadway.

OTTAWA, ILL., July 9, 1918.

Hon. L. Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We desire to express our approval of your position against turning over to Government control the telegraph and telephone lines of the country. If they are turned over to the Government, the probabilities are that rates will be raised 25 per cent at once and the service will deteriorate 25 per cent. The railroads did that, and the electric lines will do the same thing. Because the administration has the nerve to ask for everything in sight ought to be the best reason in the world that this request should not be granted.

Respectfully, yours,

W. E. PRICHARD & SONS.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 8, 1918.

Senator L. Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

As a citizen of Illinois and employee of Western Union Telegraph Co., I protest against Government control of the telegraph companies brought about by the odium cast on me and my associates that we would attempt to interfere with Government communications during war by striking. I am confident this represents the opinion of 99 per cent of my coworkers.

C. C. BOWERS.

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Will the Senator yield to me? I do not intend to speak on the pending measure.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator desire to speak now? If so, I will yield the floor to him.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. No; but I have received from San Francisco a telegram very like in character, I assume, to some telegrams which have been put in the RECORD, and because it is so numerously signed and represents the various employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. of that city I ask permission to have it inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the request of the Senator from California will be granted.

The telegram is as follows:

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., July 12, 1918.

Hon. HIRAM W. JOHNSON,
Washington, D. C.:

A San Francisco newspaper of recent date contained the headline, "Western Union keymen defer action on walkout indefinitely." As individuals and acting solely upon our own initiative, we, the undersigned Western Union employees, wish to convey to yourself and the Government the emphatic and unanimous statement that the proposed strike or walkout has not even our moral support and certainly not financial or membership representation among us. We are content to perform our duties under existing circumstances and as loyal Americans we desire that you place before the Congress our views in the matter which are briefly expressed as follows:

1. The majority of us have devoted our life's energies to the telegraph service, and the knowledge thus acquired is now being exerted to the utmost in our efforts to assist our employer in effectively transmitting telegraph messages of the Government, which are so essential to the winning of the war.

2. The company's liberal policy in arranging without cost to the employees a pension, sickness benefit, and life-insurance plan, together with vacations, 8-hour day, and promotion from the ranks, is all that can be expected of a corporation which is so vitally interested in the prosecution of the war.

Any legislation affecting our interests is of vital importance to us, and it is our belief that your deliberations in the matter will not be influenced by the agitation for unrest which did not originate within our ranks. We believe our views are identical with other workers of the craft in the United States, and if no military necessity exists, we would urge that your deliberations be deferred and a final decision not reached until a canvass of the Western Union forces can be obtained.

L. A. HANCOCK AND 321 OTHERS.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, having been recognized, I now suggest the absence of a quorum and will hold the floor after the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson, Cal.	Nugent	Smith, S. C.
Beckham	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Smoot
Benet	Kellogg	Penrose	Sutherland
Borah	Kendrick	Phelan	Swanson
Brandegee	Kenyon	Pittman	Thomas
Chamberlain	King	Poindexter	Thompson
Colt	Knox	Ransdell	Trammell
Fernald	Lenroot	Reed	Underwood
Fletcher	Lewis	Saulsbury	Vardaman
France	McCumber	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Sherman	Walsh
Gore	Martin	Shields	Warren
Hale	Nelson	Smith, Ga.	Watson
Harding	New	Smith, Md.	Wolcott
Henderson	Norris	Smith, Mich.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON of California in the chair). Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Illinois will proceed.

CHARTER AND FREIGHT RATES—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. FLETCHER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 4 and 5.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, and 6, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Page 8, line 11, after the word "the,"

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire at this time to address myself to the joint resolution and to present to the Senate my reasons for the support of the resolution both in the committee and on the floor.

Mr. President, I have heard the discussion of the eminent Senators on both sides of this question, all of which have been presented with skill, none of it presented with bitterness, and justice compels me to say the discussion has shown reflection, sincerity, and, above all, displayed patriotism. But, Mr. President, I happen to recall that Froude, in his Life of Beaconsfield, addresses himself to the observation that more measures were beaten under the reign of Beaconsfield in Parliament by having them understood by the public for what they were not than by any other form adopted by his opponents. The historian is alluding particularly, sir, to the issue that arose at that time upon what we speak of as the corn laws, and, following that, attracts attention to the success Beaconsfield's foes had in giving out false impressions to what Disraeli did in connection with the Suez Canal, and he says, if my memory plays me not false, that for 30 days during the night sessions, night after night, London rang with the accusation that there was a measure being supported by him carrying with it certain obligations upon England, when, in truth, there was never such a measure in existence, and when, in further truth, there never were such obligations upon England as had been suggested; yet by virtue of this misunderstanding or misrepresentation the particular measure was beaten, then another lost by the same method, and from this Disraeli lost his leadership and Gladstone came again to his own. Mr. President, we have seen that condition of legislative history repeated on this floor and repeated in every legislative body. Through misunderstanding of what a measure really means and through misconception of what are its contents it is lost or mangled.

Mr. President, at the outset I wish to say to the able Senators listening to me that if this measure carried with it the prescriptions that is supposed by Senators to be embodied in it, their opposition to it, as expressed, would be unquestionably justified. If the measure had for its purpose the things which Senators assert is its object, I would approve their opposition. But, Mr. President, I can not overlook the fact that the eminent Senators in many instances have misapprehended the meaning of the joint resolution, if I correctly understand it, and have without purpose, but with effect, sent it out to the country that the measure has for its scheme that which is wholly foreign to its reading and distant from the end that is in view.

Then, sir, that brings us to ask what is the gravamen, as we lawyers frequently use that expression, of this joint resolution? What is the soul of this body which I ask to be adopted as our offspring? What is the particular thing that we are asking Congress to do; and, above all else, sir, what truly is the power that we are asking that the President be permitted to exercise?

Mr. President, the first few lines of the joint resolution serve to explain its purpose. They present the attitude which I urge the Senate to espouse as its own:

> That the President during the continuance of the present war is authorized and empowered, whenever he shall deem it necessary for the national security or defense, to supervise or to take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems, or any part thereof, and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war.

Mr. President, we must all see that there is nothing in this joint resolution calling for the President to take the properties of these companies. Let us banish that delusion. There is no command here to the President to take the telephone companies. Let us end that illusion. There is no law proposed here embarking the Government upon what is termed Government ownership of these utilities. There is nothing in the joint resolution which has not been expressed in several resolutions of similar tenor, whether they related to our difficulties with Mexico, with the little countries of Nicaragua, Haiti, and Santo Domingo, or in many other instances connected with the present war.

The joint resolution is that we merely empower the President when, in his judgment, and when from facts which he shall know, and when from facts to be brought to his knowledge, he shall find it necessary to take control. This is not to empower him to the object, only that he may control it. Senators, it is not that he might have to supervise it for supervision sake, but only to control it to the end and to the extent solely of the necessary national defense, and then only is he permitted to operate to the extent and in the way that would be essential, in his judgment, upon the information he has, to the national defense.

I must differ from eminent Senators, whose sincerity can not be questioned, to whose capacity it is always a privilege of any man to pay tribute, to make the charge that the resolution vests at once in the President of the United States the control of the telegraph and telephone property as property. I deny absolutely that there is a foundation for the charge made that the joint resolution authorizes the President to operate the properties to the exclusion of the companies which own them. Sir, I do hold, and present to these honorable Senators this thought, that, when we have passed the joint resolution, the President under no wise takes possession of this property; under no circumstances but one does he assume to operate it. The power to him granted by the joint resolution is never to be exercised until subsequently to its passage there are circumstances manifest to him, from evidence incontrovertible, proved, and evident, that for the national security or for the defense of the country he should step in and assume that control.

Surely Senators will recognize that whether the President under this joint resolution ever does take control lies with the companies themselves. They must surely recognize that if the President ever does, in behalf of the Government, assume to operate, it will be because of the action of the companies themselves or of others over whom they have no control.

Sir, so long as these companies are operated between themselves and by themselves in a manner that in nowise imperils the national defense, there is no authority for the President to supervise them, far less to take them over. So long as the conduct of the companies in their private ownership, in the general discharge of their functions, is conducted in the manner which these telegrams presented by Senators inform us it has been conducted, with loyalty to the Government and security to its people, there need be no fear from any source. The property will run the same as it has been running; will be controlled as it has been controlled. It will be operated in the exact same manner as it is now and was before the passage of this resolution. The employees will hold the exact relation they now hold to the employers. The owners will exercise the same dominion over the plants. There will be nothing disturbed. There will be nothing interrupted.

When eminent Senators or others in their place shall make the charge that the joint resolution authorizes or directs the President to take this property over merely by virtue of the passage of the joint resolution, I must invite to their serious consideration that they unconsciously misrepresent the contents of the resolution and its operation. They assert an unintentional misrepresentation of its purpose that is nowhere expressed, never asked, and in nowise intended.

Then, surely Senators must realize that, far from its being a measure that appropriates the property of any person under the ordinary conditions of commercial life, it does to the contrary. Far from affecting in any wise the relation between the employee and the employer, it leaves them in the exact status quo in which we have found them.

Far from injecting the Government into interference with their private relations, whatever they may be, we facilitate them—particularly we encourage them—if the parties in control and operation shall, in the administration of the properties, so conduct themselves that they are not called upon to answer the charge of disloyalty or of incompetency and neglect in the discharge of their duties.

Sir, when I say "neglect of their duties" I do not mean as between themselves and their employees. That we are not taking cognizance of. When I use the word "incompetency," I do not mean as between themselves and their masters in the service. That, too, is between themselves. I mean such neglect and incompetency of the interests of the Government in the discharges of whatever duties they have to discharge. Only upon proof of such, only when that is established, is the President, as I read the joint resolution, authorized in anywise whatever to interfere——

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KNOX. Does the Senator from Illinois desire it to be understood that under the authority proposed to be conferred by this joint resolution the President can not take over the telegraph and telephone lines to the same extent and exercise the same control and authority over them that has already been exercised in respect to the railroads?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator from Pennsylvania that my judgment is that under the joint resolution the President can exercise the authority, but that the spirit of the resolution is that he is not to enter upon such until there has been some evidence brought to him that it is necessary for the national security and the national defense. Here I call the attention of the able Senator to the fact that after we gave the President the authority to take the railroads they were not taken until subsequent hearings were had, until adjustments of compensation were reached, and until it was evident to the able Senator, as it was to us all, that the railroads had failed to serve the national defense, not because they willed not to do so but because the circumstances of their obligations through their private contracts made it impossible for them to give priority and precedence to the Government without laying themselves liable to damages and great losses. For that reason I will say to the Senator there did arise the necessity of national defense and the need of taking over the roads.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I understand perfectly well that position, and I entirely agree with the statement made by the Senator from Illinois that it will only be upon the happening of such a contingency that the President would act at all; indeed, the joint resolution does not give him the power to act until such contingency arises, but the impression made upon my mind by what the Senator has said is that even though that contingency does arise and the President does act, it would be such a qualified assumption of control or direction over these companies as would essentially differ from the authority that he has exercised over the railroads; and I simply wanted to know if that were the Senator's position.

Mr. LEWIS. I was unfortunate if I left that impression. It is not my position. My position is that, if once the President is forced to interfere in the property, to take control of it, to exercise operation because of the necessities of the national defense, brought to him upon proof, then his supervision of the whole property is as complete in every respect as it is now over the railroads.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Assuming, as the Senator has said, that the President will only act under this joint resolution when our national security or defense has been threatened, yet when we grant the power, as a legislative body ought we not to have some evidence of the possibility of such a contingency arising? Can the Senator inform us of any contingency that might arise that would require the President to take possession of these wires?

Mr. LEWIS. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the query of the Senator from North Dakota is very pertinent and is one I have no doubt that has arisen or may arise in the minds of many of the Senators from time to time during this whole proceeding. I answer it as I see the situation. First, Mr. President, I ask Senators, I ask my able friend from North Dakota, what does he think must have been the excuse for the President of the United States to have this joint resolution brought to the Congress? Will Senators assume that out of a mere speculation on events the President of the United States indulged a curiosity by sending a joint resolution of this portentous responsibility to Congress and asked them to give their support to it if he did not know, as the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of our forces, some reasons so impelling upon him as to justify him in asking it?

Mr. PENROSE rose.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are two things that are presupposed by the Senator. The first is, that the President sent the joint resolution to Congress. All I can find out is that the Postmaster General recommended it, and the President agreed with his recommendation. But is there any evidence that this joint resolution originated with the President? And assuming that the President did send it, ought not Congress, ought not we, whose judgment is to be exercised, receive the information upon which we can exercise that personal judgment?

Mr. LEWIS. Before I reply to the Senator from North Dakota, may I ask if the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] rose to introduce a paper?

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I was about to address an inquiry to the Senator from Illinois, which is almost identical with the one the Senator from North Dakota has just made.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, Mr. President, I will try to meet that. Now, sir, first, I answer the Senator from North Dakota that I am unable to inform him if the President originated—to use the words of the Senator from North Dakota—the resolution. The Senator may be correct that the Postmaster General did so. Of that I have no detailed information; but this much we do know, that, while the joint resolution was pending, the President of the United States displayed his interest in it and his desire to have it passed by writing a Member of the House, who is also a member of the appropriate committee of the House, urging the passage of the joint resolution because of what he thought were exigent reasons; and subsequently, in further communication with the leader of the majority of the Senate, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and to members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which I am one, the President pressed the measure for the earliest consideration. It is from that that I am compelled to deduce that the President's interest in this matter, as an official, is because of information as to the necessity for its immediate passage.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Does the Senator contend that the Senate is not entitled to the most ordinary information as to the necessity or the reasons for a piece of legislation of this importance; that we must take it and gulp it down by what is vulgarly known as the "steam-roller process," without any reason whatever, but simply because a rumbling is heard at the White House? That might be a moving cause for action by the majority, but it is not for me and, I take it, not for most of the minority. It seems to me that it is extraordinary that we are denied even 48 hours to deliberate and consider and secure information about this matter. We have practically ceased to be a legislative assembly, and might as well leave rubber stamps here to record the edicts of the White House.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I deplore that any Senator has a feeling that, in discharging a duty put upon him by the Commander in Chief while we are at war, he has resolved himself to such a lowly attitude as the eminent Senator defines to be a "rubber stamp." I can not accept that appellation, and I would resent the attempt to apply it to any Senator on this floor.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HALE in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield again if the Senator so desires, but I am going to reply to his query quite fully, unless the Senator has something to add to it now.

Mr. PENROSE. I was going to indulge in an observation, but perhaps it would interrupt the logical sequence of the Senator's thought.

Mr. LEWIS. I will fully reply, and if I omit anything concerning which the Senator desires further light, if I may give light, I will yield to the Senator afterwards.

Mr. President, I have said that it is apparent that there must have been reasons of an impelling nature or the President would not have been found sponsoring this joint resolution and urging its immediate passage. Senators, if there are such reasons, as there must be, they must be of a nature which treats of that second clause, the condition upon which the whole resolution is predicated—the national security. The President must have information that touches the Government so ominously and so seriously as to involve the national security and defense. Senators, I propound to you the inquiry, Is it contended by any Senator on this floor that if the information the President has on which he asks for the passage of this resolution is of such consequence and is so impelling, touching the matter of the national security, he should detail that information by a message to the Senate, revealing it all to the public, and thus destroying the very object he has in view? By informing all of those concerning whom we may now have detected in things which we are now trying to avoid, of which we invite them to note they have been discovered. They then flee their ground as birds before the hunter. They will turn their methods to new avenues, and resort to new achievements of which we will be ignorant. Thus frustrate the very purpose the President had in sending to the Senate the joint resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, does the Senator conceive of any limitation upon the requisitions of the President? I am not greatly impressed by the threadbare phrase "Commander in Chief." That covers a multitude of sins. I consider that, as a Senator of the United States, I have my responsibilities and prerogatives; I am asked by my vote to help give this authority, and, in being so asked, I am entitled to a reason. The threadbare observation that the Commander in Chief in an evasive and uncertain tone has suggested the propriety of passing a measure which has long been the fad of the Postmaster General, without any reason, is not satisfactory to my mind. I should like to ask the Senator what limitation there is to this? Suppose there should be another rumbling at the White House and some understrapper should come down to one of the clerks of the Senate or House, perchance, and state that the presidential mind is moving in the direction of immediately taking possession of all of the raw materials in the country as a military necessity, or that the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy thinks that a military necessity exists to seize the coal fields and the copper mines, would the Senator then, without argument or reason, vote to hand over all those properties to the President?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, if the Senator has concluded his inquiry, I will reply to it.

Mr. PENROSE. I have concluded one of my inquiries.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, I answer it——

Mr. PENROSE. Others doubtless will arise as the Senator progresses.

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator has concluded his present inquiry, I will answer it first. Let me say that the Senator himself empowered the President of the United States to do the very thing which the Senator says or assumes is not the President's privilege. The Senator voted for a resolution making a declaration of war, called forth by the peril of his country, and in that joint resolution he voted that the President of the United States should avail himself "of all the resources of his country" that could by him in his position as Commander in Chief be commanded.

Mr. President, I then answer the Senator and say that, when the President in that office sends in a resolution from which it appears he has reason for having a thing done that is wholly in pursuit of the national defense, and which Senators know is so connected with the national defense, as are the uses of telegraph and telephone systems, it must be presumed that he exercises his discretion, and that he is exercising it wholly within the power conferred upon him in the office of Commander in Chief. I say to the Senator that if the conditions arise such as he suggests, of sending down a message indicating his desire to take charge of the raw material of the country and to interfere with developments of that nature, it would be too apparent that such would require explanations purely local in their character, for, in the nature of things, a disclosure could not harm anyone; but we can not assume—certainly I will not—that the President of the United States could do such a thing under his power, or would do such a thing under his oath, unless he had such manifest and impelling reasons for so doing that they would be disclosed in their justification in detail.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, the Senator's answer is so involved and complicated—and I say it with all due respect—that it is difficult for me to follow it. He begins by stating that we have already given the President the power to seize all the raw materials throughout the country. That I deny; at least, I have no recollection of voting for any such measure——

Mr. LEWIS. I must say that the Senator——

Mr. PENROSE. Although I have voted for enough ill-advised and comprehensive measures to cause my recollection to be dimmed and muddled.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator, I am sure, did not mean to misstate my position.

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly I did not.

Mr. LEWIS. I did not say that the Senator had voted to give the President the right to take the raw materials, but that the Senator did vote, in the declaration of war, to give the President the right to avail himself of all the resources of the country.

Mr. PENROSE. Oh, Mr. President, we pledged the resources of the country to win the war; but that is very different from giving one man, and without an accounting, at his mere indirect suggestion, property aggregating hundreds of millions of dollars, with an absolute denial of the right of hearings, which is a high-handed, indefensible proposition on the part of the legislative body. Now, I ask the Senator again whether, if the President should send the clerk who brings the documents and messages here to see one of the clerks of the Senate and in casual conversation here it should be rumored that the presidential mind is moved to seize all the copper mines and coal mines in the country, would the Senator immediately fall down on his knees, express his assent, offer a joint resolution, and, without a hearing, endeavor to put it through?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in the first place I can not assume that the President of the United States could ever do such a thing as the imagination of the eminent Senator conjures up.

Mr. PENROSE. Well, he has done it in this case.

Mr. LEWIS. Second, the characterization by the Senator of what the President has done I feel is very foreign to what is before us; and as to myself, if I were to fall down upon my knees—alas, I do not fall enough upon my knees before higher God—I would hardly be found doing it, sir, to a temporal authority. But I must say I can not see any parallel between what is before us and that which the Senator produces as a possible danger somewhere. That invention he conjures up is his excuse, no doubt is his announced excuse, for opposing this measure.

As to the last observation of the Senator, there is much to be said, and that is the failure to grant hearings as to certain features of the matter. If I did not know that at a proper time hearings will be had as to all matters to which a hearing could address itself under this joint resolution, and that all forms of recompense and remedy will be afforded in every way that any recompense or remedy could be afforded at all, I would concur with the Senator in his characterization that the taking without such prospect would be "high-handed."

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it is no consolation to me to shut the door after the horse is stolen.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, again I am not able to see the parallel. There is no horse stolen. There is one being drawn out of the stable and saddled for the uses of the country, and to be made a messenger, as on Paul Revere's ride, to strike the alarm of the country's peril. If there is any stableman who wishes to object to his horse being used for that purpose, he must be characterized as an unpatriotic owner of the animal.

Mr. President, I beg to remain for a while upon the theme.

I have, then, assumed to state, first, that there must be reasons; that it is impossible to assume that there are not; second, that there must be reasons of a serious nature; and, third, that to reveal those reasons in detail would be to defeat the very object of this joint resolution, and would, sir, reveal the very thing which it is necessary to protect in order that the national security shall be conserved.

Now, Senators, let me give you a suggestion as it applies to my own process of thinking. Let me assume, sir, reasons for the passage of this joint resolution. Let me say that I assume them, sir, upon information satisfactory to me after investigation; and I answer the Senators and say that any information I have, any Senator in this body, by applying to the head of his Government and asking audience, whether such be a Cabinet head or the President, will obtain all he has. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], or any Senator on this floor, may rest assured that if he seeks specific information for the guidance of his vote, and is not inclined to embarrass the Government by forcing it to reveal these reasons publicly, he need only make the call upon the President of the United States in the relation he bears as coadjutor and aid, and ask of him upon the honor of the office he occupies, what information he has that he would communicate to that Senator; and the Senator may rest assured, not only will he not be denied, but, out of that general courtesy that has always characterized the President in his communications with his aids, every form of information which the President has which justifies him in his request will be given to the Senators, for the President knows each Senator is a gentleman and that the confidences will be protected. More, I say, that any Senator who seeks specific information from the Post Office Department or from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy need but make an individual visit upon the departmental head of his Government, submitting his request, to have it requited in all completeness to the full extent that is in the power and information of these departmental heads.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes; I yield. I had not quite finished my sentence, but I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are 96 Senators here. There are 435 Members of the House. Each one of them is entitled to information upon which to base his judgment. Now, certainly each one could not go secretly and surreptitiously to the President of the United States to secure some of this recondite information. The President would not have time to give them consideration. The President can give his messages to Congress. He can give them in general language, and yet in language which would be sufficiently explicit for us to understand. In the case of such an important measure as this, involving as it does such enormous consequences to the country, why is it that we have no message whatever from the President of the United States?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the observation of the Senator as to "surreptitious" information is voluntary. No one has suggested that anyone need go to the President in a manner covert to obtain "surreptitious" information. I said that if any Senator sought specific information, apart from what he had and what this joint resolution would convey to his mind, to that specific query which he would care to address to the President he would get complete reply. I say to the Senator, it is true there are a large number of Members of the House; there are a large number of Members of the Senate; but it is presumed that that large number attach some importance to the recommendation of the President, and accept at face value the message he has sent down, which is a message in the form of a joint resolution asking the Senate to give to the President the power, to be exercised when he, upon his information, shall find it necessary for the national defense. They trust that he either has information now that shows the necessity, or that when he obtains that information he will then act; and I answer the Senator now to another point directly.

It is to say if there be no information whatever to communicate now, and the President asked you to give him the power in the event that the necessity shall come suddenly to be acted upon, will the Senator write himself down as saying that because he has not all the secrets that are in the hands of the President he will decline to trust his future judgment, and will reserve to himself the right to be the supreme court to revise the President's opinion when he shall offer it? For if the Senator or his colleagues demand that the President shall give the reasons, by the same token of that he reserves to himself the right to sit in judgment as to the weight of those reasons, as to the value of those reasons, as to the worth of those reasons; and if he shall then decide they are not sufficient he reserves the privilege to decline to grant the power and differ from the President of the United States and then oppose it. Where, then, is the power in the President? Is the Senator running the war? Is the Senator commanding the Army? Is the Senator taking direction of the muniments and resources of the country or is the President? I answer the Senator, and say that it must be assumed that the President of the United States has information, and it must likewise be assumed under this joint resolution that if he has none at all, all the Senate does is to give him power so that when such ever comes to him he shall be permitted then to act without taking the time to communicate it to this body and ask their judgment upon it while the land burns in the flame that was lighted in the delay.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. I am not yielding to the Senator to answer me. The Senator rose and asked me a question, and I answered him. The Senator may take the floor when he chooses, but I hope he will not prevent me from concluding my speech.

Mr. McCUMBER. I beg the Senator's pardon. He said, "I ask the Senator from North Dakota"——

Mr. LEWIS. But I did not ask the Senator to take my time in reply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator has a query he desires to propound, I shall be glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; the Senator addressed a question to me, and I assumed that he wanted an answer.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator if he will answer and not take my time by making a speech, because he knows he would thereby take me from the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I would not for the world take the Senator from the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois further yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. LEWIS. For a question.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not wish to ask the Senator a question. I will say that if he wants me to answer him now, I will answer him. If he wants me to wait until he gets through, I will wait until he gets through.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it is not what I want, if the Senator pleases. I am proceeding with my argument. A question was asked me by the Senator. I responded to him. Now, if the Senator wishes at the proper time to take the floor to amplify his views, of course I shall be glad to hear him, for I know I shall have information from him, however much I may differ from his conclusions.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LEWIS. I wanted to finish, but I yield to the Senator from Indiana for a question.

Mr. WATSON. Just a question. I ask for information. The Senator may have knowledge of facts which I have not learned. The Senator says that the President of the United States has addressed Congress in the form of the joint resolution that is now pending. Does the Senator mean by that that the President formulated this joint resolution, or that the President, after the joint resolution had been formulated by somebody else, sent it here; and if so, through whom, and by what agency?

Mr. LEWIS. I have called attention a number of times to the fact that when this joint resolution came here, embodying these views, the President, in different forms of expression, asked to have it passed, and sought to facilitate it by his specific request; and to that extent, I said, it argued that the President embodied this joint resolution as his instruction to us that there was a necessity for it.

Mr. WATSON. Now, will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. To whom did the President give these specific instructions, or of whom did he make the specific request?

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator heard it read from the RECORD—first, the joint resolution which came from the House, which came out of the committee of the House. The Senator has seen the communication written by the President confirming that which the Postmaster General had stated, and which has been read from the floor time and time again in the presence of the Senator—for he has been a diligent attendant on the sessions of the Senate—and also a letter written by the President to Chairman MARTIN and to members of the Interstate Commerce Committee asking that this joint resolution be pressed. That is the detailed information I again present to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Now, Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield for another question?

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator make no distinction between the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy of the United States, and the President of the United States in his relation to the entire civil establishment?

Let me explain what I mean. That is to say, the President is Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. The Constitution casts upon him that right and that power. In that sphere he is supreme. He may not share that authority with another. No other may ask him to share that authority with him. As such Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy we follow him, so that if, in his judgment, it becomes necessary to send troops to France in order to meet the Germans there, we have no right to question that authority in the least. Now, while that is true as to the Military Establishment of the United States, does the Senator conceive that the President has the same power with reference to mining and to agriculture and to manufacturing and to commerce and to transportation and to navigation? Are they military affairs, to be run by one-man power? On the other hand, or to put it in another way, if you please, Congress alone, if I conceive the matter correctly, has the right to dictate as to the civil establishment, and therefore Congress ought to be satisfied as to any measure having reference to the civil establishment.

In other words—permit me to continue the question—if it relates to the Military Establishment, even then Congress has a right to its own opinion and to its own judgment, voiced in legislative enactment; but so far as the civil establishment is concerned—and I want the Senator's opinion about this—if the President wants something done with reference to it, is it not his business to make known that fact to Congress, and is it not the business of each individual Congressman, in both House and Senate, to exercise his judgment in voting upon the specific proposition?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I recognize the distinction between the civil authority exercised by the President of the United States and the military authority vested in him as Commander in Chief. My reply to the able Senator from Indiana is in a short phrase. Wherever the President is called upon to do those things which relate to the civil establishment he serves as President of the United States, and his responsibility is jointly to this body, together with the other, and to the people; but where he serves as Commander in Chief, as has been often and often heard from me, my contention is that where he has decided that certain instrumentalities are necessary for the conduct of the war, in that respect he is Commander in Chief, and his own discretion is to be exercised to his own judgment. Therefore, the Senator will see, it turns upon the subject matter and the uses of that particular subject matter as the test, each case to be decided upon its particular circumstances.

Now, the Senator, without intention to interrupt the unfinished sentence, interrupted me at a point where I wish now to take up the thread of my remarks. I wish now to assume reasons. I wish to assume them upon a basis of rumored fact.

Senators, this joint resolution authorizes the President, whenever the necessities of national defense shall justify, to take control of the telegraph and telephone. Let us assume, sir, that there is a cable in Newfoundland, not under the jurisdiction of the United States as a country but owned by American proprietors. Let us assume that there is another cable in Cuba, not under the jurisdiction of America as a country but owned by American proprietors.

Let us assume that there is a cable in Mexico, a country not under the supervision or control of our land or our officials, but which cable is owned by American proprietors; and, sir, let us assume that there are connections by telephone service in all parts of our country leading up to the telegraph, or from the telegraph to the telephone, communicating messages to Florida which may be sent to Cuba, to be then sent over a cable; messages to Newfoundland which, under the supervision of Canada, are sent from Newfoundland; messages from Mexico by wireless to Hawaii, and from Hawaii to cable; and, sir, from these let us assume that the information as to the departure of every ship which has gone from the ports of our land laden with the sons of American mothers has been communicated, and the description of every pound as well as the quantity and quality of its cargo—having for its object the preservation of our men from hunger and our Nation from dishonor—all has been communicated, and information by which submarine commanders making their way to this land from Prussia knew the exact division of the Atlantic coast where 13 ships lay in silence, their crews restoring themselves to strength by resting in quiet waters through which the submarines were able to make the raid that occurred before the eyes and knowledge of America here but a short while ago. Then, sir, let us assume other information, through the forms of cable communication and telephone attachments, that enabled the enemy to know as each transport put out that when it reached near the waters of Europe it could be hovered about with those water fowls of evil omen which we speak of as the submarine, and our ship's very destiny and the lives borne by it threatened with destruction with every wash of the waves that swashed its hull. Will Senators then say, if such a condition did exist, that the American Government should not have the right, if the conditions shall continue to exist, to have every supervision of the employer and the operator of the telephone and telegraph, that he as well as our lives and property should be protected?

The eminent senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] says they have the power now. I must reply to him that that has been the error indulged by able Senators. The power to censor—yes, but not the power to control a perfectly innocent message, which on its face conveys nothing to the operator, or that loyal employee of the company or of the Government, and nothing to any human being then in charge.

May I be pardoned, Senators, if I give you a sample message? A small boy rushes to a telephone, and he telephones: "There is no buttermilk. It will not be in until next Wednesday. Will you please inform the doctor?" And then there goes another message, innocently handled by a little boy who steps in to a telegraph office, handing it to an innocent operator, who sends it out, saying, "The buttermilk will be sent out," giving a certain time. Now, that, because of the face of the message being wholly misunderstood by us, would convey nothing about the fact it meant. We are not in charge. What can the company do if the message is handed to it in its innocence? Shall it decline it? Shall it be subject to all the inconveniences, and perchance the suits, that may follow from it? Or shall it be subject to the charge of scandal and slander against the sender if it should assume there is something wrong about it, and so charge? It can not. But the Government, in no wise interfering with commercial messages, in no wise interfering with the general discharge of duty, reserves the right to make full and complete investigation, and protect your land and your country against the uses of things so innocent on their face that they deceive the most loyal, and yet so destructive in their effect that we would be utterly unable to overcome their consequences.

Therefore able Senators must see that censorship of the mere messages will not remedy what I assume, for the purpose of argument, might be a state of facts; and I tender them to the Senators that they may realize that perchance, if such things as I have referred to exist, or might exist, or could exist, or are likely to exist, there is not one that would not vote the power to seize and temporarily supervise all of these agencies to avoid their being used to weaken the national defense and imperil the national security.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. LEWIS. Gladly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator from Illinois attach any particular significance to the statement of the Secretary of War that no military necessity requires this legislation?

Mr. LEWIS. I must say to the able Senator, in the first place, that he has misconceived the Secretary's statement. He said no present military necessity. This meant at the time he was testifying. He added that he did not know as to the future. I do attach importance to it, and I accept it on its face, that according to his judgment the military necessity at that particular time was not so pending as to require the seizure of the wires; and I invite the attention of the able Senator—good lawyer as he is and acquainted with legislation as he is—to the fact that the joint resolution does not authorize the taking of the properties now. It merely vests the President with the power, should eventualities arise that the Secretary of War said were imminent, or could be, that only then, and then only, should he exercise the power.

Having stated, as I was free to do, to the Senate some things that I say may be born of my imagination and may be tendered merely as illustrations, and merely to give to the Senate a miasmatic dream that I may have—a phantasmagoria, we may say—but some things which are sufficiently likely to justify my apprehension and call upon me in this particular case to tender this justification to the Senate as a reason—in this connection I must be fair to the body, and I will be just to myself—I say to this honorable body that if you defeat this joint resolution, if you say you will not accept this joint resolution for its face, vesting in the President the right to take over this property in the event that an emergency shall arise to justify, to his mind, that necessity for the security of your Union, you may defeat the joint resolution; but, Senators, you can not defeat the purpose. The President, when that situation will arise, secure in his knowledge, if he does his duty as Commander in Chief, will seize the property by whatever power he may command, supervise and control it with every agency he can bring to bear; for, failing to do that, he would surrender his office, and surrender you to the ravages of your enemy, to the destruction of the foe; and if he did it, as I hope he would, I advise you he would appeal to the American people for justification; and I am bold enough to call your attention to the fact that there never has been a time when he has appealed to the American people that they have not sustained him as against any opposition, whether born of political advantage or commercial profit.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator know that if conditions did arise in which it was necessary for the President to take over these telephone and telegraph lines, Congress would and could pass such an authorization within two days?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator, it seems not, since now, when it is evident there must be some condition justifying the preparation for the taking and when the President sends here a joint resolution for that purpose—which it can not be assumed he ever would have sent unless there were good reasons—it takes days and days—three days—to consider it. Therefore it appears, for reasons apparent to all, that it can not be had.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if there had been a clear statement made to Congress, and the reasons given why the passage of the joint resolution was desired—not publicly, but to individual Senators, the same as they have been given in the case of other legislation—I say to the Senator now that there is hardly a Senator or a Member of the House but that would have voted for the joint resolution, and would have given the President the power; but there does not seem to be at this time even an inclination to give any reasons why this legislation ought to pass.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator, has he asked the Postmaster General, or the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy, or the President of the United States for any specific information he himself would prefer to have before voting for this joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, I know the attitude of the Postmaster General——

Mr. LEWIS. We will omit him for the present from the query.

Mr. SMOOT. For we have a public document, printed, giving all of his arguments as to why it should be done, before ever there was a war.

Mr. LEWIS. I have adverted to that.

Mr. SMOOT. It is here. I have it in my hand. As far as the President is concerned, the only thing that I have seen is the President writing a letter to a Member of Congress, indorsing the statement made by the Postmaster General; and the Postmaster General gave but two reasons why it ought to be done, and neither one of them applies at this particular time. As far as the Secretary of War is concerned, I have simply noticed in the press a statement made by the Secretary of War, and the press itself says that the Secretary of the Navy is in favor of the joint resolution. I know nothing further than that.

I wish to say to the Senator now that when legislation in the past has been asked for it has not been asked in that way. If it applies to foreign affairs, the members of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate and the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House have been called to the White House and the reasons given to them for adopting it and they have conveyed it to Senators on both sides of the Chamber. But I say to the Senator now no such information as that has been given in regard to this particular resolution.

Mr. LEWIS. I am particularly attracted to the expression of the Senator that other legislation has not been transacted as this, and that important legislation was not sent through as has this. My mind reverts to the exclamation of the Duke to Orlando in "As You Like It":

> This wide and universal theater
> Presents more woeful pageants than the scene
> Wherein we play.

If there had not been some extraordinary circumstances, this unusual method of this legislation would not have been precipitated upon the Senate. Therefore, if we were looking for a reason convincing to one it would be that this resolution did come in this unwonted shape, and we can say with Hamlet, "Methinks it has a mien so strange as to arouse me." Therefore I must say to the Senator if there were no other reasons this one would attract me to the impression that in it all the President is justified. But I will point out to the able Senator, as I have pointed out to others who have done me the courtesy to hear me, that as the resolution asks for nothing in the way of taking any property whatever, as it takes no property in any wise, as it vests at this time no power but merely authorizes the President in the event of conditions arising satisfactory to him for the defense of the country that he may be allowed to do so. No change of anything is now effected.

Have Senators remitted themselves to this position that they are to sit in judgment upon the President of the United States as to when he shall exercise it, a power vested in his discretion? Are they to constitute themselves a court of revision of his "errors," for if his reasons are to be submitted to you, do you reserve the right to pass upon whether they are sufficient for your approval of his policy? If you do that, then it is you whose reasons are to prevail, not the President's. If you are approving them because they are the President's—in this emergency—there is no need for him to submit them. If your policy is to disapprove them, when you do not for reasons of your situation concur in them, you unconsciously defeat your land and deprive your Nation of its quick security and defense.

Then you are finally driven in the last analysis to this conclusion: Which of you shall be the judge of the emergency upon which the President shall take possession of the property? He who will have the information, he who will have the surrounding circumstances which now environ him, or you, Senators, who can have no knowledge from time to time of those details, being busily engrossed in other matters in pursuit of your legislative duties? To whom will you commit the charge—to yourselves, to act on, in your usual method of procedure, to meet first in session and then to struggle for a quorum; then to get a committee meeting to submit the legislation to in legislative form, and then wait until the committee reports, to find one side or the other in opposition, and that opposition to surge here like a ship battling in a storm, and while fighting for a result your country in the meanwhile to be sent to its wreck? Surely, Senators, you will realize that such a position can not be maintained. Yet it is such condition that will be if your contention should prevail.

Now, Mr. President, my eminent colleague [Senator SHERMAN], the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], and many on my side—I need not at this time recount them—I may add, the eminent Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], from observations expressed are sincerely opposed to the theory of the Government entering what might be called Government ownership of the public utilities, such as the telegraph and telephone.

Mr. President, upon that question there is great ground for difference. We will fight it out in this country very shortly, and some result will come from the popular ballot, for as I see it, it will be one of the things which will be one of the domestic issues in connection with those issues that will grow out of peace terms to be fought over in the next presidential contest. The political parties of our country will make assertions upon these views in some form or other, but until then, as I see it, I am unable to see that the question is now before this body.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WATSON. Inasmuch as the Senator has referred to the Government ownership of public utilities, and inasmuch as he has correctly stated my position, may I ask his?

Mr. LEWIS. Yes. I, sir, have been for a long time the advocate of the Government ownership, and if the Senator could have been here instead of being in committee meetings or elsewhere on official business and heard my argument upon the railroad bill he would have gathered my position as he will gather it now. I say I am now a sincere advocate of the Government taking over the railroads, telegraphs, and telephones, and every other agency necessary to the welfare of the Government and for the uses of government. I would that the people shall possess themselves of the people's property—highways and communication—but as to the operation by the Government there I differ from many of those who are with me as to the ownership. I would in each instance operate that particular property in such a way as that property may be best operated for the welfare of the country and the uses of the patrons; in some instances by a private lease; in some instances through a corporation, as we do the Government shipping affairs or other instances I might speak of, as banking establishments; in some instances by a commission controlled by the Government. I have serious doubts in my mind whether we are ready to enter upon operation by the Government as a governmental function. As to that I have not reached the point where I can give such unqualified approval.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has said that he is in favor of the Government taking over these properties. Does he mean that he is in favor of Government ownership or private ownership with Government control?

Mr. LEWIS. I am for Government ownership, but in many instances I would be for private operation, making the operations subject to Government supervision, but in each instance I feel it would have to be determined by the nature of the property and the demand upon the public.

Mr. WATSON. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. LEWIS. Surely.

Mr. WATSON. Would the Senator limit such Government ownership to railroads, telegraphs, telephones, and express companies or would he go further and apply it to mines?

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to the Senator if I were to enforce my policy I would limit the ownership to those particular agencies necessary for government. Railroads and telegraphs I regard as necessary to the Government. That is the highway of communication. As to mines, I say to the Senator I have long been an advocate of the Government holding such property as coal, oil, and minerals, but I would not have the Government enter into operation and development. Those I would turn over to private enterprise and private operation, merely supervising them, so as to never lose the Government control, so that whenever necessary for the national defense we could promptly possess ourselves of the properties.

Therefore, Mr. President, the objections urged by Senators as to Government ownership can be admitted to be well taken for the purpose of this argument. They are not pertinent now. When the time comes to present a bill that really takes the property for Government ownership these objections, I trust, will have a liberal audience. But at present I can not see that the question is before the body at all, and prejudices upon that subject must not be allowed to enter here and serve to defeat the measure for the only purpose for which it is introduced. When I opened my discussion I alluded to that particular thing. It was that the sentiment of prejudice, I feared, would find favor and might enter to strengthen here and before the public opposition to this bill, for that they were given to feel that this was a measure of Government ownership, to be perpetuated upon the Republic as a policy of the administration, that I insist is not before the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator has been very courteous in yielding.

Mr. LEWIS. And the Senator is also courteous in his queries.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator says that that question is not at issue and is not involved in the present controversy. Is it not a fact that before the committee of the House Secretary Baker appeared, Secretary Daniels appeared, and Postmaster General Burleson appeared, and that each one voluntarily stated that he was in favor of Government ownership and operation of the telegraph and telephone lines, and that he has always been of that opinion, thereby volunteering their preconceived opinions on the subject of Government ownership to the members of the committee in that hearing? Does not that of necessity thrust that question into this controversy at this time?

Mr. LEWIS. I may reverse that situation for the Senator. As an illustration, there are Senators here who are in nowise favorable to the railroads being owned by the Government, yet they voted for the railroads to pass under the control of the Government at this time, because they felt there were exigencies that justified it. By the same reason the mere fact that members of the Cabinet may favor the Government ownership at some other time or favor it as a principle is no argument against pressing this particular resolution for its limited purposes, for I advise the Senator that upon examining those reports he will see the Postmaster General said, "I do not think that anybody's fad should at this time be put forward under the guise of necessity of the war"; and he specifically refers to such as obnoxious to him. Indeed, he refused to urge this measure, which the Senator is quite correct in saying the Postmaster General favors, at this time as a measure of civil administration. He presented as the only theory of its present necessity the purpose of immediate protected communication for war uses.

Now, I will call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to this: The Senator has served with distinction in the House. I have served there with experience. He knows that while the House is at times impetuous there is not really a more conservative body when suddenly summoned to serve an obligation than those representatives of the American people. Will the Senator assume that a resolution like this could pass the House of Representatives with such a vote and be brought to this body after a hearing before their committee without something in the mind and heart of those men convincing them of an emergency that justified it? I must assume they not only knew it but felt it overwhelmingly.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know whether the Senator was in the Chamber at the time the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] replied to an inquiry made by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. I think the Senator from North Carolina stated that the reason why the House passed the joint resolution without hearings or without any discussion was that they expected hearings to be had in the Senate, and they expected the investigation to be made here, and therefore there was no necessity at the time and under the circumstances existing in the House to go into the details of the measure at all. I do not know whether the Senator heard that statement or not.

Mr. LEWIS. I beg to say to the Senator I fear his memory has not served him accurately. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] made the statement if the Senator will look at the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I think both.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator will remember that he said it was the habit of the House to do that. At any rate, from whom it came, the sentence was uttered. I think that that was the deduction and possibly may have been based on information, but this much is true, it was uttered. That related, I may say to the able Senator, to the smaller question of compensation and to details. I do not think it related to the question of necessity, for the House had that question before them when they had the Cabinet officers. They had summoned the Cabinet officers for their information.

Mr. President, that brings me then——

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LEWIS. Surely.

Mr. WATSON. In view of that proposition, I will answer the Senator's question by asking him a question, Yankee fashion. What did the House know about this question that we did not know? Did it have information that we have not gotten at this time? I do not know what impelled them to take the action they did; but what did they know that we do not know now in this body?

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator has concluded his query——

Mr. WATSON. I have.

Mr. LEWIS. I fancy the House, having entered upon the inquiry and obtained that information in a manner, as we lawyers call it, from the manner and appearance of the witnesses as well as what they say they gathered from all as well as from the tenor of the resolution, that there was portentous urgency. The information they had is not different from that which we have. We have the hearings and we have the resolution, and with that we have the corroborative fact that there must have been an atmosphere surrounding that House and also circumstances which justified the immediate passage of the joint resolution in the overwhelming manner it was passed, which to me is very influential and very commanding.

Now, Senators speak of the objection addressed to Government ownership. Let me pause a minute to say, Mr. President, I concur with the sentiment expressed by Senators respecting the loyalty of these employees of these companies. I think one of the most remarkable instances of personal honor that has been shown to the world is that displayed by telegraphers. How many thousands of times has a telegrapher been possessed of knowledge conveyed by telegrams which, if communicated, he could not only enrich himself but create confusion among hundreds of others. The instances indeed are rare that one has been accused, and no instance of established proof. And no man could gainsay that their loyalty has not been proven by every test, and that they are loyal to this Government in this emergency all proclaim, and none but a slanderer would assert to the contrary. But each can only know what is in his power to discover. How often the most innocent appearing individual tenders them a message, availing himself of service yet imposing upon the employee and making that honest man an innocent instrument of great danger to their Republic.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I merely wish to say at this point there can not arise under this resolution the suggestion anywhere that there is involved in it a reflection upon these employees or upon their competency or of their loyalty, and none can go out from this body drawn by implication or inference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator know a single instance in which a telegraph or telephone operator has betrayed his trust?

Mr. LEWIS. No; and I answer I do not think it will ever arise; but I do say to the Senator, since he has put that query, he has in common with other Senators noticed many messages went out perfectly innocent—empty, indeed, of suggested danger—which became the agency through which things happened to the Government which gave us all great embarrassment.

Mr. President, it has been intimated that the Postmaster General desires this measure to use it in some quality of censorship. I have stood on this floor and opposed the Postmaster General in many things through honest opposition as to measures coming with his recommendation, their application or their need, notably in that of the pneumatic tubes in which my city was greatly interested. I can not be said to be a prejudiced defender of every position of the Postmaster General.

Mr. President, if I thought for one moment, if for a flash of time there could enter upon my soul the conviction that the Postmaster General would use this measure to censor just agencies of the news, by which they could be diverted to favoritism of any sort, or to obstruct it merely because he did not politically favor their contents, I would not only cease the advocacy of this measure but I would denounce such an agent as unworthy of a public trust, and if so the truth came to me that he had done such a thing I would make it my duty to inveigh to his superior officer to remove him with such suddenness as would indicate to America that no such outrage could exist with the approval of the President of the United States. But, sir, I feel in my heart that which I utter with my lips, that it would be the very last thing in the world that an American citizen such as Albert Sydney Burleson could do. Born and reared under the skies of Texas, where the theories of liberty and freedom of man have been taught to a greater degree than, surely to an equal degree, as in any Commonwealth of our land, that he having been a prosecuting attorney of his home community and intrusted in that office for years as a representative of justice, and then being sent by his people to Congress, and having served in that body as a public representative with renowned distinction and learning, from all his environments and surroundings the theory of American institutions, I denounce myself the suggestion that such a man could ever lend himself under any influence whatever to the wrongful censorship of the press or bring upon it an oppression such as is the fear expressed by Senators on this floor. Justice to Postmaster General Burleson compels you to give him an exemption from the possibility of such accusation.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Some weeks ago the Appeal to Reason, a paper published in Kansas, a socialistic sheet of most radical tendencies, printed a statement to the effect that certain representatives of the Post Office Department had temporarily taken possession of that office because of alleged treasonable publications. That sheet was excluded from the mails for some five or six days. Subsequently it appeared under a new name, the New Appeal, and on the editorial page the announcement was made that henceforth it would not seek to hold up all the socialistic ideas it had advocated in days gone by, but that the paper would content itself with advocating the Government ownership of telegraphs, telephones, railroads, and express companies; and thereupon the Postmaster General freely opened the mails to the circulation of that sheet. Is it not fair to assume that the Postmaster General did that because he believed in those doctrines himself and not because those doctrines were inimical to our institutions in time of peace?

Mr. LEWIS. My answer to the Senator is this: I know nothing of the facts. I take his statements upon their face as being the fact, and upon that predicate I respond.

First, the paper was charged to have contents in violation of the espionage law and opposing the law passed for the protection of the Government. Subsequently it appeared to have changed its course. As to that feature, the fact that it continued as to certain other principles which were always principles of its contention in nowise argues that because it insisted two or three or abandoned four or five, that either was the reason why the Postmaster General permitted the publication. I will say to the Senator it was because the publication had abandoned those expressions which were inimical to our country and treasonable in their spirit to the Republic.

Now, I say to the Senator, this power vested in the Postmaster General, often on this floor condemned by Senators, has been exercised time and time again; and I ask the Senator from Indiana, the Senator from Illinois, my colleague, and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will they not be fair and just, according to their nature, and admit that in every instance where the Postmaster General has exercised the power of exclusion from the mails he has been sustained by the courts, and in only 3 instances out of 11 were the members of the court of his political party or the representatives of his political views? Will not the Senators recall that the sacred tribunal to which we ever make appeal to test of right, the courts of our country, under the Constitution has affirmed the conduct of the Postmaster General, leaving it no longer a subject of our accusation or dispute?

Sir, may I say to the Senators that when Senators on this floor condemn the Postmaster General because he exercised the authority vested in him to use his judgment and his discretion as to when this mail is forbidden, when it is proper and improper, and seem to think of his action in terms of tyranny, I invite them to the fact that there was nothing new in his course. It happened under the Republican administrations of Presidents in the past in the exact way as now exercised. The law under which Postmaster General Burleson has acted is of the exact wording of which was passed by this body in several forms at several times. May I invite the attention of the eminent Senators to the proceeding of the court against Postmaster Coyne, of the city of Chicago, appointed by an eminent Republican President. I cite the case of One hundred and ninety-fourth United States, decided years before the war. We find that the constitutionality of the law was assailed in time of perfect peace and tranquillity. This law authorized the Postmaster General, "upon evidence satisfactory to him," to deny the use of mails to certain publications. Surely those are the exact words, are they not, of the present law, under which a Democratic Postmaster General, or one so called, has acted? Why is it that he can be so characterized at this time in executing that which was a mere copy of a law passed by a previous administration, called Republican, in a time of peace and vindicated by the courts and executed by Postmasters General appointed by the eminent Republican predecessors of President Wilson? Let it be understood that the Supreme Court of the United States later had occasion to pass upon the question.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator will allow me to finish this——

Mr. WATSON. Very well.

Mr. LEWIS. In the suit of Smith v. Hitchcock, the Postmaster General of President Taft, the Supreme Court of the United States had occasion again to speak of it. Thus they say:

> The ground of the bill was that the privileges had been annulled without granting the hearing required by the act (31 Stat., 1099, 1107), and that the publications were periodical publications within the meaning of the act (20 Stat., 355, 358, 359). The Postmaster General had decided that the publication was not a public "periodical"—

I am reading from 226 U. S., 53—

> "and could not be carried as second-class matter"—

But would have to go differently, and stated the reason. Mr. Justice Holmes, speaking for the court, said:

> Thus a question of law is raised, although, as suggested in Bates & Guild Co. v. Payne (194 U. S., 106, 108; 24 Sup. Ct., 595, 48 L. Ed., 894), we should not interfere with the decision of the Postmaster General, unless clearly of opinion that it was wrong. * * * We have no such clear opinion.

So Senators must see that all the things which they denounce in the present Postmaster General is a mere exercise of power duplicating that which was exercised in time of peace and tranquillity by his predecessor under a preceding Republican administration. What justification can Senators offer for such discriminating injustice? I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Was the decision to which my able friend refers a lottery decision or a decision on obscene literature?

Mr. LEWIS. One. I answer the Senator—one.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator make no distinction between cases of that kind and censorship of telephone messages between farmers from one farm to another?

Mr. LEWIS. I answer, I must say I know of no censorship of telephone messages from one farmer to another. I never heard of it. I do not believe the Postmaster General could ever do such a thing or that under this law such would ever be allowed. He is the last man of America to think of such. As there is no domestic censorship of the mail so there would never be allowed a domestic censorship of wires. Having heard Senators make the assertion and having great respect for that assertion, it having moved me seriously, I interrogated the Postmaster General as to the foundation of such. He did me the privilege to say not only has it never been done but that under no circumstances would it be done, and that all Senators and every citizen of this country may rest assured that any law vested in him will only be exercised according to the spirit which is intended as we pass it, and nothing under any other circumstances be done by him, and that no censorship that is not now permitted and directly ordered by law would ever be assumed by him. He is for law, he is for protection of Government, but first he is for the maintenance of all our liberties consistent with the state of war we are now in.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield; but I wanted to make that plain.

Mr. WATSON. I am glad the Senator has given us that assurance as to the position of the Postmaster General, but suppose that this censorship should be turned over to the Secretary of the Navy or the Secretary of War. I notice on page 30 of the hearings before the House committee Mr. COOPER of Ohio asked Secretary Daniels this question:

> Did I understand you to say that you believed the Government ought to be able to control all private conversation in my home over the telephone?

To which Secretary Daniels replied:

> I believe the Government ought to have control of all communication, and safeguard you so that you could have your private communication by Government officials instead of by private employees of a company.

Mr. LEWIS. I am sure the Senator must realize that Secretary Daniels may have some personal opinion, but whatever law will be passed by this body would be the only one under which he could act. If he did have that censorship power, it would only be under a power we gave—from us he would have the final expression. I take it that the portion of testimony read by the Senator refers to the present conditions of the war. If it referred to anything else I would be surprised, because I know the Secretary of the Navy, and I know he is an ardent American, a genial Christian gentleman, and, however much we might differ from time to time in regard to policies, he is a valiant and obedient public servant.

Mr. President, I trust I have made clear my reasons why I give this measure my full support, and, sir, may I say my reasons why in the committee I opposed hearings and did, as I am rightfully charged, make the motion to report the joint resolution without further interruption. What could the hearings produce, Senators? When you ask for a hearing I have one query to put to you, and this will conclude my reference to this phase. What hearing could you have? There are but two inquiries: First, is this necessary for the purposes of the national defense? And, second, what are the compensations to be arrived at? Senators, if the Commander in Chief sends this to you and tells you that, in his opinion, there are reasons which justify your Government taking possession of these agencies for the necessity of national defense, will you take the opinions of other gentlemen brought into the committee who say the President is wrong? Will you take the opinion of every owner of every telephone if combined into one; will you take the opinion of all the stockholders of the telegraph companies if consolidated and concentrated into one human voice; will you take the opinion of every citizen of the United States, combined in a single expression, as against the one man who you know is the only man situated by the votes of the people where he can know? Certainly you will not; certainly you can not. If you do so, you write yourselves down as absurd, for you are not traitors. Then, why the inquiry, and where would it be addressed? You will see, Senators, that inquiry can not be entered upon at all without a reflection upon your own Government and upon its head.

As to the other, I concur with you. There must be inquiry as to the value of the properties and the compensations, if we shall take them; but that is provided for in the joint resolution.

Why have hearings now for a thing that may never arise? If the joint resolution proposed to take the property now, your animadversions would be well founded, but as the provision is only to allow the property to be taken, if ever the owners shall create the necessity upon which it shall be done, then arises the time to inquire, and only then. The joint resolution specifically, broadly, and comprehensively provides that at such time compensation shall be arranged in the very same and exact manner as you have provided in a number of instances. Where is the ground for complaint as to that? Therefore, the mere fact that provision is not now made for a future condition that may never arise, for a contingency that may never happen, can not rightfully be urged here as an obstruction to merely giving power to be exercised if conditions shall so arise as to call for the invoking of it. It is on this phase where I differ from my eminent friends who speak of the inquiry—not that it should not be, but that the time has not yet arisen to demand it. When it shall arise who shall make it? The executive body has always done it—the body who administers the property.

Senators, you are a set of lawyers and of business men. I ask the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]—and there is not any better type of lawyer in the part of the country where he lives—if a railroad came up and took his farm, would he ask by law to stop to find out what should be the price before the railroad entered upon condemnation of the land? The Government took lately property near here, in Virginia and in different States of the Union, for its uses. Did we stop to make an inquiry as to how the land should be paid for, what price should be paid, before we ordered it taken? No; we proceeded to condemn the land; we proceeded with the processes of condemnation; then we summoned the jury and called in the experts as to the damage and agreed upon its value or yielded to the judgment of the court. Here you are proposing to do the very exact thing in a time of war, amidst all of the emergencies of the hour, and to condemn at such a time and in the same manner as in "the piping times of peace," as in the case of an ordinary condemnation of land for a railroad track. So I revert to my proposition as I opened. Let there be no further deception as to this measure; let us banish these illusions; let us step out of this tent that has been woven around us of darkness and gloom as to the meaning of the measure.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the junior Senator from Utah?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I think it is only fair, however, to the opponents of the position taken by the Senator from Illinois to state that the illustration which he gave is not a fair parallel. In the case of the Virginia land, or in the case of the farm of the eminent Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], before it could be taken, there must have been an adjudication—perhaps interlocutory in character—that the land was needed for a public use. Before anyone had the right to step upon the premises of the Senator from North Dakota or of the owner of the land in Virginia there had to be a determination that the land was needed for a public use. With that determination, then the question of the ascertainment of damages is one which may be remitted to the courts, a bond being required, except in the case of the Government. The bond is furnished, and the person bringing the condemnation proceedings enters into possession of the property. Then the jury subsequently is called into the box to determine the damages.

The contention of those who are opposing this joint resolution, as I understand their contention, is that, given the necessity for the taking of the property, they have no objection to the method of ascertaining the damages; they are not complaining of that now; but the Senator from Illinois assumes the necessity, whereas those who are opposing the measure do not admit the necessity, but say that as soon as the necessity exists then they are perfectly willing that the property shall be taken.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it is evident that the junior Senator from Utah was too engrossed with more important matters and did not hear that I specifically covered that feature. The first inquiry is as to the necessity of taking over the property; and the question, then, is, Is there a military necessity for its taking, involving the defense of the country? I drew an illustration here, and asked who shall decide that? Why have a hearing? If every owner of the property had said one thing on one side, and the President, the Commander in Chief, with his knowledge, said another—as he does in the joint resolution—and then every citizen, consolidated and concentrated into one human voice, with all its power, had said to the contrary, whom would we take? Thus it was I demonstrated that the question of necessity became, then, a determined one. Why have a hearing as to those whose judgment we know we could not follow because they have not the information?

In the instance that the junior Senator from Utah parallels, there is an ordinary matter where the railroad company steps in to say it is a public necessity, and anyone who differs from it, to wit, the agents of the property or the citizens owning it have an opportunity to contest the claim, and the judge finally decides it; but in that case it is as a mere expert opinion as to whether or not the road is needed in that particular locality; and surely the Senator does not consider it a parallel to a case like this.

We have before us no such circumstance; but we have the opinion as to the necessity of the President of the United States as Commander in Chief, bound to defend this land under certain emergencies; and I respectfully urge that the necessity having been shown in the matter in no sense was there any question of compensation, and all other questions, such as the privileges of the telephone companies, the rights of small companies, and the adjustment of leases, can be left to the executive department, as they have been in the case of the railroads which we have taken over.

Did we oppose the taking over of the railroads because there were hundreds of intermediate leases in the different States all over the country then existing? We trusted to the executive branch to adjust those matters, as they will be adjusted here. There need be no fear of injury. There are four appeals—one is to the executive department itself, which will take control of this subject; then to the President of the United States; then to the Court of Claims; and then to the Supreme Court to finally settle the matter. That is all that any man has in time of peace.

I again assert, sir, that there has been a shrouding of the measure in mystery and, without intention, considerable misconstruction of its object that deludes the public mind as to its purpose. I am seeking to bring us back to the real merit of the measure and the only thing it does, namely, vest the President of the United States with power to take the property according to the methods pointed out by the joint resolution if ever, in his judgment, from any facts in his possession he may think it shall ever be necessary to do so.

Mr. President, I have taken considerable time because Senators have interrupted me freely—a thing I have invited—and I acknowledge the courteous manner of their interrogatories, and I trust I have not been less courteous in reply; but we have done a great deal, I think, to make clear the issue; but here, as I conclude, I wish to press one thing upon those who hear me.

Why is it that every time the President of the United States sends anything to this body at a time when we are at war, and after we have voted him the authority to conduct it, we can never admit merit in his demands? Why is it that in every instance of his requests as to extraordinary matters there are those who arise to question the sincerity of his appeal, to dispute its practicability, to oppose its being granted, and, finally, to defeat, if possible, the object he seeks to attain?

Senators, have we come to the point when we certify before the world that there is nothing the present President of the United States can do that we can approve? Have we reached the point that every act must be certified by us as unworthy or imperfect, whether it is a revenue bill or a railroad bill, the Overman bill, or a bill affecting the War Department in regard to a limitation of the draft and the ages of soldiers in their availability for service; that some Senators who must arise to assert in themselves supreme judgment over all those who have given the subject constant, dispassionate, and ceaseless consideration; that everywhere, under all circumstances, we present ourselves as being the sole repository of all the wisdom upon the subject, and certify by our conduct no confidence in our country's superior commanders? Senators, I shall not probably allude to this again, but I feel here I may be permitted to do so.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LEWIS. I do.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator from Illinois meant to refer to "our superior commanders"? I wonder if he does not want to qualify that phrase?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I had used specifically the phrase. I spoke of the Army and of the Secretary of War; and if the Secretary of War and the President are not superior commanders of the Army and of the draft, I am unable to know the theory of law.

Mr. REED. But the Senator was speaking about the Senate of the United States, as the context will show. I have no quarrel with him if he wants to employ that language; but I thought I would, in all kindness, call his attention to the way in which he had employed it.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I meet gladly and greet pleasantly, I trust, interruptions. I am perfectly sure that I divided my sentences into three parts. I referred to one measure, then to the second measure, and then I came to the third, the last; and in that connection I referred to the Secretary of War and his recommendations. It may be that the context is as the Senator suggests, but if it is, Senators know that I did not refer to anybody as being the superior commanders of the Senate. It could not be conceived that I could have made an allusion of that kind, and it can not be urged that I would tolerate any other man making it intentionally without correcting him. I say to the Senator that my intention then and now is to allude to the fact that we never yield to the superior commanders, in whom we have vested those things of mere discretion, judgment, and control, but always sit in judgment, on the theory that we must first suspect their object and then we must defeat their purpose.

Mr. WADSWORTH rose.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator arise to interrogate me?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should like that privilege.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator has laid down a very sweeping principle. He has alluded to the discussion, I assume, that occurred on the floor of the Senate in connection with the extension of the draft age. The Senator will remember that some Senators upon this floor thought that America could win the war more quickly if the Army were enlarged. Does the Senator contend that a Senator holding those views should not speak them?

Mr. LEWIS. No; I feel that any Senator holding convictions should speak them; but I say to the Senator that when recommendations have been made by those who understand these things, first, as to the number of men needed and where for fighting, the number of men needed to stay at home and provide supplies and where, and when, after seriously considering those subjects they have sent their recommendations to us, we without any knowledge on our part, as I have said, and with no information on the subject and with no opportunity of having obtained it, nevertheless didactically assert our superiority of wisdom when we have had no qualifications upon the subject, all merely that we might cavil with those who have recommended or defeat them in their design. It is that, sir, that I say certifies to the soldiers abroad that their eminent representatives in this body have no confidence in their soldiers' commanders. Now, my eminent friend says I used the words "our commanders," and probably I did.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator yield again?

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from New York, and then I will yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator, in all seriousness, contend that the slightest indication of a difference of conviction or opinion on the part of any individual Senator with the Secretary of War or the Chief of Staff indicates a lack of confidence generally, and that that is the impression that goes to our soldiers in France? The Senator is indulging in some rather exaggerated statements, if I may say so, which I think he might well think over before he puts them in the RECORD unmodified and unqualified.

Mr. LEWIS. I assure the junior Senator from New York that this particular Senator thinks as he moves along, and frames his expressions as the result of his thought. I uttered the thought upon reflection, and I repeat it upon deliberation. It is my judgment, and therefore my assertion, that when the Chief of Staff and Secretary of War send in recommendations as to what should be the ages of the draft, after investigation, and certain Senators assume, without any investigation whatever, to sit in judgment upon the question, they sit in obstruction upon it, and give the country to understand that they have no confidence in those men who command nor in their recommendations, and by such contentions they invite the hearts of our soldiers to distrust and to kill that patriotic fervor and confidence that would follow, sir, from another example.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the premises stated by the Senator from Illinois are incorrect. There was an examination and investigation in which the Military Affairs Committee was assisted by the man who knows more about the draft than any other man and from whose advice on more than one occasion a majority of the committee obtained the very clear impression that the draft age should be extended. So it is not quite accurate for the Senator to say that without any investigation or inquiry, and without knowing anything about it, some Senators had the hardihood to express their convictions on that question.

Mr. LEWIS. Of course, Mr. President, the junior Senator from New York, being a member of the committee, might assume that the information he and his colleagues had was superior to that of those who made the recommendations, and I have no doubt that they had that conviction or they would not have taken the attitude they did; but I have my conviction, and express it, that I do not think it was demonstrated anywhere that they had information sufficient to justify them in obstruction that continued from day to day against those recommendations, when they could have been espoused and affirmed by the action of this body, given splendid sustenance and aid, and sent to legislation with an impetus that would have been inspiring before the world.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what delay and what obstruction does the Senator refer to? What draft is he referring to—the original draft?

Mr. LEWIS. I may answer the Senator from Missouri that I am not referring to the original draft act, but I am referring to the amendment that was brought in here a short while ago as to the age limit against the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff.

Mr. REED. There was an amendment offered to the Army appropriation bill. The Secretary of War came here and brought the Chief of Staff, and they asked that action be deferred until they could submit a plan; and almost without an hour's delay their request was acquiesced in, even by those of us who were very firmly of the opinion that the draft age should be changed and that there was an impending necessity for the change. In all my experience in the Senate I have never seen a more ready disposition to accord the greatest consideration to those whom I will call the "war authorities." I do not know what the Senator talks about when he speaks about obstruction. I do not like to challenge my friend to do anything, but I say to him that he can not find in the record the evidence of any obstruction.

While I am on my feet, I do not think the Senator ought to be trying to put the Senate in the position that he has by saying that every time the Senate undertakes to exercise its judgment it disheartens the soldiers at the front. If I wanted to do so I might make a counter statement that I have some evidence to sustain, but I think the less we discuss that question the better.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire from the Senator——

Mr. LEWIS. I will yield to the Senator in just a second. In responding to the Senator from Missouri I do not know to what he alludes when he refers to "counter evidence"; I do not know to what subject matter my eminent friend alludes, but I recall to his mind that the senior Senator from Missouri and the senior Senator from Oregon, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, both stated that whatever opinions they had concerning the matter, they yielded them to the judgment of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Staff,

The Senators must realize, therefore, that they can not come within the designation or the category of my accusation, but those who with amendments and otherwise continued to obstruct upon this floor for days and days, and who could see nothing in the department that showed wisdom, but everything that testified to ignorance, and held it up to criticism and condemnation before the public—it is of these I speak.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I do not think the RECORD will show that the bill was held up for days. Perhaps two or three days passed during which time Senators made speeches suggesting their ideas in regard to what ought to be done, some for and some against, but all of it of an illuminating nature. The Senator ought not to try to put the Senate in the position of having sought to obstruct. The Senator is making a very delightful and splendid speech this afternoon. While he has been making that speech, of course, a vote upon this measure has been to that extent delayed; but he is not, therefore, to be charged with obstruction. He is making the speech in good faith to impress his views upon the Senate and upon the country, and it has been a very powerful and illuminating address, although I do not agree with half he has said; but that does not make any difference. If I were to express my opinion upon the other side, I would not be obstructing the public business, but I would be taking part in the public business.

Now, I affirm that there has been no obstruction in the Senate upon any war measure. I will just make it that flat and challenge anybody on earth to prove the contrary. There has been obstruction in the way of debate, but no filibuster upon matters that have been dragged in here by the ears, and that people have characterized as "war legislation." I do not think the Senator ought to castigate the Senate in this way.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, my eminent and ever delightful friend from Missouri having relieved himself of the burden that was disturbing within him and having overflowed me with its meltings, I assure him that those who did not come within the comprehension need not fear their application.

Now, it is true, Mr. President, I have taken some time in presenting the reasons justifying this measure, but I have spoken for it, not against it. I have set forth what I felt, sir, was a reply to objections which have been urged against it—objections, I must insist, which from many quarters are offered to obstruct the measure by being addressed to things that are not in this measure at all.

The eminent Senator says that he differs from my argument, but pays me the compliment of saying my speech is illuminating. It is that where it is illuminating that the Senator opposes. I dare urge that it is where it is attractive where the Senator differs, and for that reason, I fear, my friend can not find it agreeable to concur with me in the final conclusions.

I was about to conclude when interrupted by Senators. I have finished the argument on this subject matter. I repeat to the junior Senator from New York, or to any other Senator, that I view with great regret the situation to which I am about now to advert. If anyone can cite me to an exception I shall be glad to have it; but I ask where is one single measure of a nature such as this that the President of the United States has sent here to which the Senate has unanimously given its support—beyond measures of finance and bond-issue bills? Not one. Surely those measures have not been wrong; surely they all have been not subject to criticism; surely they all should not have been obstructed. Time has demonstrated in their trial and enforcement that they were just and beneficial, and yet we continue the policy. I, therefore, raise my voice not against sincere opposition—my eminent friend from Missouri and my friend from Utah and others are wrong—it is against opposition to things that do not exist, but which are charged with being contained within the covers of the bill, creating, sir, an image of ugliness and disdain, and firing upon it as if it were the visage of the legislation that is reared here.

Let us look to this measure for all it is, for what it is. I submit that these are times, sir, when individual opinion could well be yielded up for the public good and some regard given to those officials in authority who day in and day out, through long, arduous, toilsome hours, bear their burdens in suffering and who need our aid, and need it to give to the world that flame and flash which leads mankind to new hope and gives encouragement to the soul that fights for the liberties of this land and for the justice of our Nation.

So at this hour I beg you to follow your captain, and, if I may add one command, it is that you salute this measure with the countersign "pass."

I thank the Senate for its courtesy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as the eminent Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] questioned the statement that I made in referring to a statement made by him as to what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] said on Saturday of last week when the question of a recess was under consideration, I am going to take the time of the Senate to read just what he and others did say, so that it may appear in the RECORD, and let the Senate decide whether I was wrong or whether I was right in my statement:

Mr. MARTIN. * * * I do not know of any urgent necessity for hasty action on this important matter.

That referred to the resolution that is now under consideration—

Not a single fact has been given, not a single argument has been made, not a single suggestion has come to me showing there is occasion for extraordinary haste in so important a matter. My judgment is—and I believe it is the judgment of the Senate—that it should go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and hearings should be had, and a careful investigation made before it is taken up for consideration in the Senate.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] said:

I want to know if it is the program that we are to take a recess and leave this important legislation suspended here between the two Houses?

Mr. MARTIN. I know of no other program except that of the two bodies. My belief is that an overwhelming majority of both Houses contemplate a recess and hope it may come to-night. They do not expect to consider that matter before the recess. No one is authorized to make a program, but the concensus of opinion, as far as I have been able to gather on both sides of the Chamber and in the House, is that the Senate and House ought to have some rest and relaxation from labor now and take a recess.

Then the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] interrupted, and said:

Mr. President, I do not think the action of the House in passing the joint resolution is an expression of opinion in the House that the matter is so urgent that it should be acted upon immediately. On the contrary, I think, taking the circumstances under which the House has acted, it is rather an expression which negatives that idea, because the House acted with full knowledge of its purpose, in which it asked, as far as an individual and private expression could ask, the consent of the Senate for a recess this afternoon. The House knew perfectly well that this matter ought to be investigated. The House passed the joint resolution and sent it over here with the expectation that we would take a recess this afternoon. The House expected the Senate to make that investigation and the House knew it could not make it to-day. Therefore the action of the House does not indicate that it was the expression of opinion on the part of the House that there ought to be immediate action.

I read this in order to sustain the statement that I made.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, does the Senator from Utah think that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] convicted himself as an obstructionist?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator I certainly do not, and I do not believe that any Senator who rises upon this floor and speaks to a subject properly before this body, presents his views, his ideas, and how he looks at the proposition is an obstructionist; and if he does not do it, I say that he is not doing his duty to his constituents or the people of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator will recall that I merely called attention to the fact that the statement was made by the Senator from Virginia, not by the Senator from North Carolina. That is the only correction I made of the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator will see now that the statement I made is correct.

Mr. LEWIS. The statement was made; but when it came to the Senator from Virginia, the chairman, through unconscious error the Senator charged it to the Senator from North Carolina, and I corrected it.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I did not charge it to the Senator from Virginia. I charged to the Senator from North Carolina the statement which the RECORD shows that he made.

Mr. President, I do not desire to proceed to-night to speak upon this subject. I do not know whether the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] intended to take the floor at this time or not.

Mr. WATSON. No, Mr. President. I will say to the Senator from Utah that I understood that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] desired to speak, and also the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. I understood that the Senator from North Dakota desired to make some response to the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. SMOOT. A number of the matters referred to by the Senator from Illinois, it seems to me, were of a personal character. I hope the Senator will be present when I speak upon this subject, because I am going to refer to them. I desire to call particular attention to the attitude not only of myself but of other Senators, in relation to the granting of every request made by the President of the United States for power to be exercised by him during this war. I say to the eminent Senator now that he can not charge to the Republican Senators that they have not voted almost unanimously for every request that has been made by the President of the United States, after information had been received as to reason of the request; and I do not believe that any Executive was ever sustained by an opposite party as President Wilson has been sustained in the requests he has made for power since the declaration of war. I want to say to the Senator, however, that while I am opposed to this joint resolution, I would not hesitate a minute to vote for it if it were going to advance the interests of the Government in any way. If it would help in the execution and carrying on of the war, I would not hesitate for a minute to vote for it.

But there is no evidence to show that it would do that, and there is evidence and there is acknowledgment on the part of many who are in favor of this legislation that if the telegraph lines and the telephone lines were taken over by the Government of the United States it would not run them as efficiently as they are run to-day, and I do not believe it would. If there is a case where the telegraph lines or the telephone lines in this country have been used to transmit information to our enemies, it ought to be easy of proof. Some cases ought to have come to light; it ought to be possible to give some information to the Senate. But no such information is given; nothing except that the power is asked for.

The Senator from Illinois refers to the fact that we have authorized the President to take over the railroads, and therefore he says that every one who voted for that measure ought to vote for this. Why, Mr. President, there is just as much difference between taking over the railroads of this country in the condition the railroads were in, and taking over the telephone and telegraph lines of this country, as there is between darkness and light.

Everybody knows that under the unwise and unjust laws that have been passed in recent years that affect the railroads they could not secure sufficient money to make extensions, provide cars, and keep the roads in order to meet the growing needs of the country. The taking over the railroads by the President was not a war measure; it was a financial necessity, and everybody should know it.

Mr. President, I want to say that if the railroads had not been taken over they could not have financed themselves, the Government having monopolized the money market, and the cost of operation greatly increased, with a denial to increase rates, and in my opinion they would have been in the hands of receivers before this, and I am positive the President of the United States was fully aware of conditions. If a considerable number of the railroads had gone into the hands of receivers, and the obligations of those railroads had been made next to worthless, the President, as well as all of us, knew that the placing of the liberty loans would have been affected.

Mr. President, we created the War Finance Corporation not because we wanted to do it, but because we had to do it. If any great class of business of this country is allowed to fail, involving billions of dollars, as would have been the case with the railroads, the whole commerce of the country would have been seriously affected, if not generally ruined, and it was far better for the Government of the United States to finance the railroads, to finance public-utility corporations, to finance every corporation that is producing material for war purposes, than to allow any of them to fail at this time.

Is there any reason for the passage of this joint resolution now? We know nothing about it if there is. Is the Western Union or the other telegraph line asking for financial support? No. Are their employees complaining of the treatment they are receiving from the companies? No.

On the contrary, they are petitioning Congress, and every Senator has received telegrams stating that they do not want the Government of the United States to take over the telegraph lines; that they are content with the treatment and the wages they are receiving; and that they are just as loyal as the men who stand at the head of this Government in carrying on and carrying out the policies of the war.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that when a Senator is charged with being an obstructionist, when a Senator is charged with being in such a frame of mind that he can not conceive that there is any good in anything that the President may suggest, it is unfair; and the record of this body, the record of every Senator, I think, goes to prove otherwise.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not intend to discuss the merits of this measure at this time, and perhaps I shall not do so at any time.

I have been for many years a believer in the policy of governmental ownership of the telegraph lines of the country. I have been very strongly inclined to the opinion that that policy might well be extended to telephones and to railroads. I have realized that there were disadvantages inherent in such a policy; that it might mean the creation of a vast power in the governmental officers, and hence result in perpetuating the supremacy of any party once it had gained possession of the office. Therefore I have always been of the opinion that in taking over public utilities an independent board or tribunal, or at least a board as nearly as possible independent of all political entanglements, should be given charge and management.

But the argument pro and con has been very evenly balanced, and the determining feature in my mind always has been whether a plan could be evolved which would perpetuate business policies and at the same time give us the benefit of a public control.

I shall offer an amendment to this measure somewhat bearing upon the question of the control of the property, and perhaps another amendment which will have for its purpose suggesting the agency of that control. Now, when I do that I do not want any Senator to say that I am "violating the orders of my Commander in Chief." I have no commander in chief. I am not in the Military Establishment of this country. The only command I acknowledge is the will of the people of my State, and the only rule of conduct I admit as supreme is the Constitution that the people adopted, which I swore before Almighty God I would uphold and sustain. I will never wittingly break that oath.

How do we happen to sit in this Chamber? I think the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is right, possibly, in the remark he makes under his breath, that "if our people had understood us we might not have been here." That may be true as to some. I am, however, sure it is not true of the distinguished Senator. We are here by virtue of the Constitution and the sovereignty of the people exercised pursuant to that document. We are not here by the kindly permission of any man. We are here in response to the sovereign voice of the only people on this earth who are sovereigns. The man who will ever intentionally impinge upon that sovereignty of our people is a worse enemy of this country than is the Kaiser of all the Germans. When we were sent here, therefore, we were sent under this Constitution; and as I read that Constitution this Government was divided into three separate and distinct branches, each having its prerogative, its duties, and its limitations.

The Executive is charged with the duty of enforcing the Constitution solemnly ordained and the laws duly enacted by the people through their representatives in Congress assembled.

The President does not possess a single power save it be found written in the Constitution or the laws. By the Constitution he is made the Commander in Chief of the Army. But the President is not the commander in chief of the Supreme Court or any other court. He is not even the commander in chief of the humble court of a justice of the peace. He is not the commander in chief of the Congress of the United States. He is not the commander in chief of the people of the United States. He is only the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, and Congress can, if it desires, make the Army great and powerful or it can entirely disband it. The President has not now, and as long as this is a government of free men never will have, the power to pass a statute, nor will he have the power to decide what are the rights of citizens under the law. He is possessed of an office of great power, of vast responsibility, and to him, as the representative of the executive department of a mighty people, every loyal man pays respect. But who passes the laws? Who is charged with that responsibility? The people reserve the right to pass the laws, and to pass them by the voices of their chosen delegates. The voice of the people is heard when the Members of the House vote at the other end of this building, and their voices are again heard when the Senators vote in this Chamber. We speak for them, and we are responsible to them. We are the instruments by which the people make the laws of the land. If ever we abdicate our duty to make the laws, we betray the people who sent us here, we betray the Constitution of the United States, we brand the word "traitor" upon our foreheads and write "scoundrel" over our history.

There can be no worse offense against human liberty than for a body of men charged with the solemn responsibility of performing certain great acts for a great and sovereign people to betray the trust laid upon them and to treacherously transfer the powers granted them to another; and this is true, no matter how great the man or how exalted the tribunal to which the transfer is falsely made. The act is in any case treason against the people who gave us power which we employ in defiance of their written instructions.

When we, as the representatives of the people, have passed laws, the question of their construction is not with us. The final construction of them is not with the Executive. It is vested ultimately in that tribunal of wise old judges who sit to determine and construe the law. When, therefore, Mr. President, a case is presented to that court it must decide that case. It can not turn over that case for decision to the Senate, and say to the Senate: "You decide it." If the court should do that it would violate its sworn obligation and betray the country. Neither can the court turn its decisions over to the Executive, nor can it transfer its judicial authority to any tribunal, to any man, to any officer. If it were to undertake such an offense as that it would be subject to impeachment, and if it were not for the fact that it is almost placed above legal responsibility it would be liable to a worse penalty, if, indeed, a worse can be conceived.

No more, Mr. President, can Congress transfer its duty to pass laws. If it has a duty to pass laws, then it has a discretion to exercise—an intelligent discretion, it is to be hoped, but whether it be intelligent or nonintelligent, it is a discretion which it must exercise. That discretion must be a free discretion, or it ceases to be a discretion at all. If we fail to exercise our discretion according to the best light we have, we fail in our duty to our constituency, to the sovereign people of this country. If this Congress ever concedes that it has any other commander in chief than the sovereign people of the United States, it will go down in history as the most infamous body that ever betrayed a republic. It will not, I am sure, sink to such an estate.

Let us apply these observations to the case before us.

Here is a matter manifestly demanding legislation by Congress. The Senate is one branch of the law-making body. It therefore becomes our sworn duty to legislate for the good of the country. Therefore we must, if possible, legislate wisely. Ever since time was, a part of the process of legislation has been discussion of the proposed law. To be of any avail the discussion must be free, open, and untrammeled. Any other kind is utterly useless. Not only must the discussion be free, but the formation of opinion therefrom must be free, or else the body ceases to function; and when the Congress ceases to function, I repeat, it has played traitor to the Constitution, traitor to the people, and traitor to human liberty.

I make no complaint if the President of the United States sends a bill to Congress or sends a message to Congress saying that he desires legislation of a certain kind, because under the Constitution he has a right to make these suggestions. It is his duty to make these suggestions whenever he thinks they are necessary. It is our duty to respectfully receive them, and it is also our duty to faithfully and carefully consider them. But when all that is done we still must exercise our judgment; and I insist, Mr. President, that because Members see fit to discuss questions, and because they see fit to disagree to propositions, no man has the right to assert that they are thereby obstructing the public business. I regret that such assertions have been repeatedly made here to-day.

If it be conceded that we are to consider legislation, it must also be admitted that the right to consider implies the right to make up our opinion, and that the right to make up our opinion involves the privilege of making it up either for or against the proposed law. Otherwise we have no right to have an opinion; and if we have no right to have an opinion, then the Congress should be abolished. A body which has lost the right to think ought at once to cease the pretense of representing the people.

Mr. President, without at this time undertaking to closely trace the legislation of recent months, I want to say this much: I do not believe the history of the world will show that any legislative body has ever so generally and in all conceivable ways cooperated with and granted powers to an Executive as has this Congress in its dealings of the last 12 months with the great Chief Executive of this country.

I stated when the Senator from Illinois had the floor that I challenged any man to show any obstruction to a real war measure since this war began. I repeat the challenge, and I am willing to let it remain as a standing challenge. I have not all the legislation at my tongue's end, but invite you to go back to the beginning of the war.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. WATSON. Is it not a fact that the last proceeding in the nature of an obstruction or filibuster in the Senate was the measure having reference to arming the ships, and that was before our declaration of war?

Mr. REED. I think so, if indeed that can be fairly called a filibuster. I was about to come to that very matter. About 30 days before we actually declared war the Senate by at least ten to one was in favor of peace. There were a few men who had been talking about war ever since the Lusitania was sunk, but the President of the United States had held up his hand. I do not adopt his elegant language, but I can put what he said in many beautiful and splendid sentences and speeches into a terse sentence; he called upon the American people to sit steady in the boat and keep their heads. From that time on to within about 30 days prior to our actual declaration of war the President had urged a policy of peace upon this country. Everybody was for peace. Congress was for peace. Even those who thought it unwise to longer keep out of the war were for the most part held in check by the desire that we should be a united people back of our President. It was a beautiful illustration of the sublime patriotism of our people.

Mr. President, you will all recall how the President of the United States stood in this Chamber and made his speech in which he declared that the war should be ended without any special victory. It was his last appeal to the warring nations to lay down their arms, and we all accorded with that, Republicans and Democrats.

So far as I am concerned, I do not propose at a time like this to go about playing petty politics. I do not propose to assail the motives of the men on the other side of the Chamber merely because they do not vote "aye" on every proposition brought forward. I know that the sons of these Republican Senators are standing in the red line of battle and touching elbows with the sons of the Democratic Senators. The blood of our brave boys, mingling together in one common stream upon the ghastly fields of France, is a certificate of universal loyalty, a bond of national unity that will outlast the centuries. It is a crimson and glorious certificate.

A little later the President came here and said he wanted to arm the merchant ships. Mr. President, there has been much talk about that filibuster. There were, after all, only about 9 or 10 men in the Senate who were not willing to follow the President in that fateful step.

I do not believe there was any real filibuster at that time. The measure did not reach the Senate until the time for adjournment under the law was almost upon us. If the Senate could have remained in session seven or eight days longer, I have not the slightest doubt the bill would have passed. So there was not a filibuster in the sense we ordinarily use that term.

But let us count it a filibuster—what happened? Immediately upon the reconvening of the Senate, the Senate overruling the precedent that had existed for 75 or 80 years, amended its rules so that there could never be another filibuster in the Senate if really a large percentage of the Members wanted to pass a measure. Two-thirds are all that is required, and a vote can be forced. The amendment to our rules was the direct outgrowth of our experience in regard to the arming of the merchant ships.

Let me pass to the next step. The President came here and asked us to declare war. We had been taught the doctrine of peace for many years, and in the last few months we had heard nothing but peace. We had listened to it from day to day. We had heard it alike from great Democrats and great Republicans. It had been thundered from the rostrum at every Chautauqua. It had been emblazoned in the headlines of every newspaper. For more than a century of time all parties had held that it was no part of the business of America to intervene in the quarrels of European countries. We Democrats had come very near making our last campaign upon the doctrine that we would keep out of this war almost regardless of conditions.

I remember the distinguished gentleman who placed in nomination the President of the United States. He had collated every historical incident of outrage put upon America from the time our Government was formed down to the present. As he related the incidents he asked, "Did we fight?" and he answered, "No; we negotiated." And the convention cheered. And upon that issue we went to the country.

But, Mr. President, there came a time when the President of the United States concluded that we had borne with the outrages and wrongs of Germany to a point where forbearance was no longer a virtue. He called the Congress of the United States together and made a speech in favor of war, and, with pale faces and tense nerves, the eyes of our minds looking upon the bloody scene we knew was about to be created, our ears hearing the cries of the mothers and the wives that we realized would ring out upon the air, our imaginations depicting the crimson stains that would soon be seen upon the lintels of American homes, we followed the advice of the President and entered this horrible conflict—a conflict the end of which we can not see, except as with the vision of loyalty we may behold that perhaps distant day when American arms shall triumph and American honor be vindicated.

There came the question how to raise an army, and we were asked to overturn the traditions of the Saxon race for 500 years that an army should be raised by volunteer forces at least until that method had failed. But the President said—if not in express terms, through his advisers—that he desired the draft, and the Congress of the United States voted for the draft. I was opposed to the draft as an original proposition. I wanted first to try the volunteer system, and I ventured to express my honest judgment. Was I thereby disloyal to my country or an obstructor? I sought to aid by my opinion. I may have been wrong. That is not the question. I was sent here to exercise a judgment, and I did so to the best of my ability. There is no man to-day who can with certainty say which plan would have been the better. But when the majority, after a short debate, determined in favor of the draft, was there any attempt at obstruction, at throwing anything in the way? On the contrary, sir, when it came to voting the money for the army to be drafted or to passing the multitude of bills that were deemed necessary in order to carry on this great scheme of a conscript army, where was a voice raised against these measures? Who sought to obstruct them?

Sir, if we desire to obstruct the place we could best do it would be in the passage of a revenue measure, because you can not pass a revenue measure in this country unless you place heavy burdens upon people and certain classes of people, and it would have been the easiest thing in the world for Members of the Senate or of the House of Representatives to have begun a debate over the terms of the revenue bill, to have raised objections, to have aroused antagonisms, and to have seriously hampered us in our preparations. But what was the fact? We voted thousands of millions of dollars, and we did it sometimes almost without waiting to read the bill. We took the judgment of the committee. We recognized the fact in the supreme hour we could not stop for little things, that we could only consider the great matters. We knew that the great thing was money, money, and still more money, because if we did not have money we could not have ships, and we could not have guns, and if we did not have ships and guns we could not have soldiers, and if we did not have ships and guns and soldiers we could not prosecute this war.

So we almost immediately voted fourteen thousand million dollars, a sum so stupendous that the brain of no human being can conceive it, the imagination of no man can picture it. That was the first draft—fourteen thousand million dollars. How much since—perhaps the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has the figures, for he deals in figures a good deal.

Mr. SMOOT. In round figures we appropriated $19,000,000,000 and about $5,000,000,000 more of authorization, making $24,000,000,000.

Mr. WATSON. And in lump-sum appropriations, contrary to the fixed policy of appropriations of previous Congresses.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator for his suggestion; it is important. When these bills came before the committee, when they came to be scrutinized by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], who has always tried to guard the Treasury, when they came to be likewise scrutinized by the Republican members of that committee, they did not hesitate and ask, "For what particular purpose is this money to be employed?" They said the money is needed, and we will trust the executive officers of the Government to honestly expend it.

Mr. President, I shall not pause to relate the story of all these measures, but we have brought in measures here, the espionage law and other laws, laws that would have made the hair stand upright upon the head of every one of us if it had not been that we proposed to make everything subsidiary to the carrying on of the war.

These bills have been passed. But sometimes a Member has ventured to debate them. That is the crime alleged. I have never heard an important bill debated yet but it has been improved. I have never heard one of them discussed in committees but there were mistakes and errors and blunders found in the bill. I have never known an instance when the Senate set itself to the honest discussion of a great measure or a very small measure that something was not discovered of importance, and some benefit resulted.

Mr. President, Senators have not been obstructing. Occasionally there has come a bill here that has aroused more opposition than others, but it is not an accurate statement to say that everything sent here from the administration has been opposed. I suppose I am one of the chief offenders in one matter. They asked to have a Food Administrator appointed, and I opposed it. I opposed it because I thought it would injure my country in this war. I am not going to discuss that question; it was my view.

Now, let us see who it is that sends us these measures that we must swallow without even stopping to look or listen. I respect the President of the United States, not only because of his great office, but because of his great attributes as a man, and yet I know two things. He is the last man who would claim infallibility for himself, and no man that I know of has more readily changed his mind when he thought the evidence was convincing. Those who blindly follow the President will be left in a very sorry position if he shall change his mind some day and they do not have notice in time to also change their minds. The President does not ask that kind of servitude, I am sure.

I shall not go through the different changes of mind that the President has undergone. It is to his credit that he changes his mind, but whenever he changed his mind it was evidence that he was wrong once. He was wrong either before he changed it or he was wrong after he changed it. That is true of every human being when he changes his mind. I do not criticize the President.

I want to put the President on an exalted pinnacle, elevated there by the great people of a great country, trying to do his best as God gives him the light, having the original gift of a great mind from his Maker, but still a human being.

Now, let us come down a little lower. The Senator spoke of "our commanders in chief" or "our superior commanders" and included the members of the Cabinet in that distinguished category. Now, I speak of the earth earthy, and I can therefore employ the vernacular of the ordinary man. I am not one who goes about abusing the members of the Cabinet. I hold them in personal regard and esteem. But what is there about the appointment to a position as Secretary to the President that puts a man upon a mental apex where he is so high the ordinary man dare not look at him?

I knew these men before they went into the Cabinet. What rot it is to speak of them as "our commanders." Here is one of them—a most gracious and splendid gentleman—he had been engaged in the battles of the newspaper world until he had reached probably the age of 55. He was not a monarch among the newspaper men. He ran a good, decent, respectable country Democratic paper. The only thing that was infallible about it was that it was infallibly Democratic. I served with him on the National Democratic Committee. He is a man of good intelligence, of splendid intentions, and of most exemplary habits, and is quite willing to make everybody else's habits as exemplary as are his own. He is making a good Secretary of the Navy, but Mr. President—and I say this in all kindness, I say it with all respect, I would not be considered otherwise—there are 100 men in the House of Representatives, there are a half hundred men in the Senate, and there are 50,000 men outside of either body who could have made a good and acceptable Secretary of the Navy; and it is sheer nonsense to claim anything else. My very good friend, Mr. Daniels, would not ask me to claim anything else.

What he has done since he has been in the position has been to study hard, to work loyally, to give to the place the very best of his time and his talent; and, Mr. President, he has accepted the advice of the best naval men in the country; and so he has to-day a pretty good fighting Navy. But I do not admit the right of Mr. Daniels to do any more than come to this body and argue a question and to suggest. Then we must decide; we shall give due regard to the knowledge he has.

If I should go to the Secretary of War, what then? A little over a year ago he was a successful practicing attorney in the city of Cleveland. He had a good practice; he was of undoubtedly good character. He had some views about universal peace that I do not entertain; he had a right to have those views. He had some views about the ownership of public utilities, and so forth, that some other people did not have; he had a right to have those views. He had been mayor of a great city. I have been guilty of that offense myself; but there is no more reason why he should accept my views as final because I was mayor of Kansas City than there is why I should accept his views because he was mayor of Cleveland, for, taken altogether, I was mayor of very much the better city.

He was utterly ignorant of military affairs. I do not know whether or not he had ever visited an Army post of this country. He was a civilian. That is all right. We have nearly always had civilian Secretaries of War, but just because this pacific gentleman was handed a piece of paper one fine morning giving him the authority of Secretary of War did not transform him into a modern Mars, neither did it put into his head a single particle more of sense than there was the moment before he received that commission. What he has learned about this business he has learned since. I frankly confess he has had some advantage over us in regard to certain problems, but we have had some advantage over him. We have been studying the enactment of legislation; we have had a grasp of the whole business of this country, as well as the problems involved in the war, while his business has been largely confined to military problems. Nor have we been without our means of knowledge. We have even had the benefit of his advice. Why, Mr. President, we have upon occasion read the Official Bulletin. We have had the advice of the members of the War Board. We have had the right to call in all the military authorities. When a problem is presented to us, are we to exercise our judgment or are we not?

I think a very great deal of Mr. Secretary Baker, but I decline to admit that he is my "commander in chief" in any respect. If I get out of the Senate and enlist in the Army, the President will be my Commander in Chief, and then I will go where he orders me.

Mr. President, I might go through with the other members of the Cabinet. They were all fine gentlemen, but there is not one man in the Cabinet who had attained to a commanding position in his country before he went into the Cabinet. There is no one of them, on the other hand, who had not thoroughly demonstrated that he was a man of capacity, of intelligence, and of the highest kind of honor; but there was no genius; there was no warrior like Julius Cæsar; no Napoleon; no statesman like Jefferson or Lincoln.

Mr. President, I am making these remarks to a tired Senate, because I am getting more tired than is the Senate of this claim that a man can not exercise his judgment and express his opinion in regard to a bill; that he must take it just as it is handed to him. I have seen bills sent over even from the Department of Justice which, if they had been passed, would have been absolutely disgraceful.

When I came to criticize one of those bills in committee once I was told that a certain subordinate in the Department of Justice had drawn it, and how great a lawyer he was, although he had never tried a case, so far as I know, prior to getting into his job; but about eight weeks after that the Attorney General took him by the scruff of the neck and pitched him out of the window, figuratively speaking, because of a blunder that no man ever ought to have made. So one by one the roses are falling. You can not make a bouquet out of the flowers of yesterday.

The whole lesson to be learned from all of it is that we ought to quit scolding each other because we venture to have an opinion. It is our business to have opinions, and we ought to quit challenging the good faith of Members of this body.

Mr. President, I have never read in history a story of such loyalty as is manifested throughout this entire land. I believe if we could do what the Almighty can do—open the heart of every man and every woman in this country—we should see there the story of a deathless love of country such as has never been engraven upon the hearts of any other people.

There are a few people who may be disloyal; there are a few criminals born every day; there is a certain percentage of criminals born on this earth in every country and clime, just as there is a certain percentage of the deformed and of the insane; but there is not as great a percentage of disloyalty in the United States to-day, in my judgment, as there is of insanity.

Look at the picture. We promulgate a law under which every boy or every man between 21 and 31 must leave his home at whatever sacrifice. They have left their homes; and you can count almost upon the fingers of your hand the numbers of those who resisted the draft. Four and a half million of them are in camps or are on their way to camps, and nearly 500,000 more have voluntarily joined the Navy of the United States. I have visited some of these camps; I have heard the soldiers discuss their hardships with laughter on their lips; they jeer and laugh over their difficulties; they make light of them; and upon the tongue of every man I have talked with there has been but one expression—the desire that the order "Forward to France" shall soon come, that he may be permitted to do his duty.

Yet you constantly find a lot of cheap fellows trying to prove that they are loyal by denouncing everybody else. I have heard Senators of the United States denounced for their disloyalty who, with tears in their eyes, have put their arms about their first born and said, "It is your duty to enlist and follow the flag." I have heard great newspaper men accused of disloyalty who have given millions of their money to the country's cause. These evil stories are reported from lip to lip and from tongue to tongue, until at last they reach inside the German lines, and when they get there the Germans are convinced that we have riot and bloodshed and disloyalty and that the Government is about to be overthrown. We are reading some stories from there now that may be similarly exaggerated; I hope they are not.

I say to you, Mr. President—and I say it as earnestly as I have ever expressed any idea in my life—that the time has come to quit this sort of thing. Let us debate questions as Senators; let us settle them according to our best judgment; let us impugn the motives of no man; and let us, above everything else, quit talking about our Republican brethren—and I am addressing myself now to the Democratic side—as though there is some difference between them and us on this great question of the war. I do not believe it; it is not true.

If I could write a certificate to send to the Kaiser of Germany, I would write this: "There are 104,000,000 people in the United States; they are not Republicans; they are not Democrats; they are patriots, willing to spend their last dollar and to drain their veins dry in the cause of their country, and, until you have crushed that indomitable spirit that thrills their souls, and until you have destroyed all of their men, you can not succeed. Long before that hour can come your throne will totter, your scepter will be broken, the bloody sword will fall from your palsied hand, and your own enslaved people will rise to bless the flag that bears the emblem of America, for it will also be to them the emblem of liberty."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 40 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, July 13, 1918, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 12, 1918.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty Father, in whom we live, and move, and have our being, inspire us with the broadest, purest, grandest conceptions of life and its far-reaching purposes; that with patience, courage, and fortitude we may do the tasks set before us daily, and pass on to the things that await us in the Great Beyond, and merit the "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord," and glory and honor and praise be Thine forever. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, July 9, 1918, was read and approved.

DEPARTMENTAL EMPLOYEES LIABLE TO MILITARY SERVICE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Secretary of the Interior, which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and to lie on the Speaker's table.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, July 10, 1918.

MY DEAR MR. SPEAKER: In response to House resolution 376, dated June 3, I submit the attached statement showing the number of employees of this department who were on June 5, 1917, between the ages of 21 and 31, and for whom exemption from military duty or deferred classification has been requested and allowed.

There are in this department, in Washington and in the field, 21,114 employees. To date we know of 1,760 of our men who are now in the military or naval service either by enlistment, commission, or draft. We have asked exemption or deferred classification, and it has been granted, for 557 men, whose services were essential in carrying forward the work of this department, and many of whom are engaged exclusively upon war work. Of these 557 men 184 are now in the War Department through the transfer to that department of the gas investigation work being carried on at the American University, 40 have gone into the military or naval service, and 25 have resigned or been transferred to other branches of the service, leaving now in this department 308 men who have received deferred classification or exemption.

Great difficulty has been experienced in filling certain positions, such as that of examiner in the Patent Office, of which there are about 400. Appeal was made to the patent bar when the registers of the Civil Service Commission became exhausted, and recently a number of women from Wellesley, Bryn Mawr, and other colleges have been appointed as assistant examiners.

Eighty-four per cent of the employees of the Bureau of Mines for whom exemption or deferred classification has been requested and allowed are engaged directly upon war work, and most of them are now under the War Department through the transfer from this department to the War Department of the work at the American University.

In the Geological Survey, where work is being done that must be continued from year to year to be of any value, such as stream measurement, deferred classification has been asked for the men oldest in the service, so that there would be some man on the work at the various places familiar with it, and others have been allowed to go as called. Where the younger men have been rejected for military or naval service by reason of physical disability, the older men have been allowed to go. The recent act providing for 640-acre homesteads requires a classification of the public lands. In doing this work we have endeavored to fill the places with men over the draft age, but where we have had experienced men within the draft age limit their deferred classification has been requested for the period of the work, in the hope that by this undertaking an increase in the food supply could be effected. For the same reason, deferred classification has been asked for a few employees of the Reclamation Service where it was not possible to replace them, and their loss would seriously interfere with the activities of that service, and thus detrimentally affect food production.

One of the employees listed under the Secretary's office was permitted to go to the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation at Philadelphia upon the urgent request of that service. The other two are engaged upon important confidential work directly connected with the Secretary's office.

The 14 men in the Indian Service shown in the list are composed of irrigation engineers, physicians, farmers, and stockmen, and a few in other occupations whose services it was felt could not be dispensed with and whom we have been unable to replace.

On June 30 there were approximately 2,300 employees of the Alaskan Engineering Commission engaged in connection with the construction of the Government railroad in Alaska. Deferred classification or exemption was requested and allowed for 16 of these men who are experienced in the work and whose services could not well be spared, but as to 13 of them their deferment was requested only for the completion of the season's work.

In the National Park Service, deferred classification was requested and allowed for five employees, one of whom is the assistant director and who serves as acting director in the absence of the head of the bureau. He has a multitude of duties to perform, both in Washington and in the field, and his services are deemed very valuable to the Park Service. The other four are all in the Yosemite National Park, where various and extensive improvement work has been laid out under the appropriation for the current year. The services of the chief electrician are especially important in connection with a power plant recently completed and the installation of new power lines in connection with this plant. The two park rangers whose deferred classification was requested and allowed are the only rangers in all the parks for whom such request was made, and in these cases the request was based on the peculiar conditions in this park, from which a number of the rangers have gone into the military service. It was desired to retain the services of a clerk, listed under this bureau, on account of his experience in departmental practice and in several of the national parks.

One of the two employees of Freedmen's Hospital for whom deferred classification was requested and granted is a pathologist, replacing an employee who left the hospital to enter the Army, and was the only one who could be found to meet the requirements of the hospital service. The other employee has been in the hospital as a pharmacist for eight years; he is a specialist in hospital dispensing and his loss would have resulted in embarrassment in the operation of the institution.

It has been found necessary to retain some of the employees of St. Elizabeths Hospital who are within the draft age, for the reason that the superintendent has found it absolutely impossible to replace the physicians, nurses, attendants, and others, and this institution must be maintained to care for the insane soldiers and sailors, of whom there has been and will continue to be increasing numbers with the large increase in the Army and Navy. A recent census at this institution disclosed the fact that there were approximately 250 vacancies, based upon a total number of 825 employees, and of such vacancies 160 existed in the ward service.

No exemptions or deferred classifications in the General Land Office, the Pension Office, or the Bureau of Education have been asked for.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE,
Secretary.

Hon. CHAMP CLARK,
The Speaker, House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the United States Shipping Board, which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and lie on the Speaker's table:

UNITED STATES SHIPPING BOARD,
Washington, July 10, 1918.

The CLERK, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
United States Congress, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In compliance with the provisions of the House of Representatives resolution No. 383, I take pleasure in submitting a statement showing the names, addresses, and character of work of all employees of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, who have been given deferred classification. This is supplemental to the list of employees of the United States Shipping Board and the Division of Operations, Emergency Fleet Corporation, which was sent to you on July 9.

Exhibit A of the attached list gives the names of employees of the United States Shipping Board who were on June 5, 1918, upon the Emergency Fleet classification lists of the various boards of jurisdiction under selective-service regulations, act of May 18, 1917; such list showing, besides the name and home address, the character of work in which the employee was engaged, as well as the date of commencement of service.

Exhibit B is a list of names out of the above list for which exemptions will not be asked, they having been removed from the Emergency Fleet classification lists. The various boards have been supplied with cancellation cards, Form 1025–P.M.G.O., as prescribed by selective-service regulations.

Very truly, yours, LESTER SISLER, Secretary.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Department of Justice, which was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and to lie on the Speaker's table:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D. C., July 5, 1918.

Hon. SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk House of Representatives.

SIR: In compliance with House resolution 377, on June 19, 1918, there was transmitted by this department a list of the persons for whom requests for exemption from military duty or deferred classification has been asked. In preparing this report one name was inadvertently omitted, and it is now given, in addition to those formerly sent, as follows:

Name: Key, Sewell. Residence: Washington, D. C. Date appointed: January 9, 1911. Character of work performed: Confidential clerk in connection with parols.

Respectfully,

SAMUEL J. GRAHAM,
Assistant Attorney General.

For the Attorney General.

MOVING PICTURES OF AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES (H. DOC. NO. 1227).

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in response to House resolution 402, relating to moving pictures of the American Expeditionary Forces, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

On July 8, 1918:

S. 3929. An act for the construction of a private conduit across Michigan Avenue NE., in the District of Columbia;

H. R. 12541. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, and for other purposes;

H. R. 12600. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, and prior fiscal years, on account of war expenses, and for other purposes;

H. R. 11247. An act providing for the protection of the uniform of friendly nations, and for other purposes; and

H. J. Res. 311. Joint resolution making appropriations for certain necessary operations of the Government and of the District of Columbia for the months of July and August, 1918, and for other purposes.

On July 9, 1918:

H. R. 12580. An act to authorize an additional issue of bonds to meet expenditures for the national security and defense, and, for the purpose of assisting in the prosecution of the war, to extend additional credit to foreign governments, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 12281. An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919.

On July 10, 1918:

H. R. 8938. An act to equip the United States penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga., for the manufacture of supplies for the use of the Government, for the compensation of prisoners for their labor, and for other purposes.

On July 11, 1918:

S. 3798. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4193. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4542. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 313. Joint resolution providing for the disposition of moneys represented in the Alfred Bernard Nobel peace prize awarded in 1906.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Waldorf, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 8839. An act for the establishment of Oswego, in the State of New York, as a port of entry for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise; and

H. R. 12002. An act for the establishment of Bar Harbor, in the State of Maine, as a port of entry and delivery for the immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. LAZARO, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 12100. An act to amend the act approved September 7, 1916, entitled "An act to establish a United States Shipping Board for the purpose of encouraging, developing, and creating a naval auxiliary and naval reserve and a merchant marine to meet the requirements of the commerce of the United States with its Territories and possessions and with foreign countries; to regulate carriers by water in the foreign and interstate commerce of the United States; and for other purposes"; and

H. R. 12229. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 4444. An act to pension widows and minor children of officers and enlisted men who served in the War with Spain, Philippine insurrection, or in China.

TRANSPORTATION OF MATERIALS USED IN BREWING (H. DOC. NO. 1228).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President:

To the House of Representatives:

In response to the resolution of the House of Representatives of June 27, 1918, requesting the President, if not incompatible with the public interest, to report to the House of Representatives whether any order or ruling has been issued or made by the United States Railroad Administration, the War Trade Board, or the War Industries Board with reference to the supply and transportation of materials, products, machinery, or equipment to be used in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors, or of building material to be used in the erection of buildings and plants for the manufacture of such liquors, or with reference to the export of malt, brewed, vinous, distilled, or other intoxicating liquors, or with reference to the transportation of such liquors by common carriers within the United States or in shipping from ports of the United States, I transmit herewith reports by the United States Railroad Administration, the War Trade Board, and the War Industries Board concerning the matters referred to in said resolution.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 11 July, 1918.

The message and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. ROMJUE, by unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. RUBEY, was granted leave of absence for 10 days.

MILITARY STATUS OF NATURALIZED FOREIGN BORN.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes in order that I may explain a request for an extension of remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MEEKER. Mr. Speaker, on June 3 permission was granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a report of investigations made as to the status of alien soldiers in the different armies of the world. After that speech was put into print a representative of the National Americanization Committee saw it and came yesterday with a report from that committee, which belongs rightly with this report which I have prepared. The report from the Americanization Committee has to do with the status of foreign-born American citizens—that is, men who have come to this country and been naturalized—as to what would be their status in their home country if they returned to their native land, what would be their liability as to military service. It also contains a digest of all the treaties existing between the United States and certain foreign countries, and names, furthermore, those countries with which we do not have treaties.

For the future consideration of the question of dealing with aliens who have been in the military service in our Army or the armies of foreign countries I deem it by far the most valuable report that has been prepared. You will notice when you read the report that we have a report as to the relationship existing between the United States and Austria-Hungary. This report was prepared and completed the latter part of 1916, before we declared war against Germany and later against Austria-Hungary. You will therefore see what had been the relationship between ourselves and Germany and also understand where some agreements have been repudiated in the past.

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that for the purpose of getting all this data into one pamphlet for the use by Congress and by those throughout the country generally, I be permitted to reinsert my remarks of June 3 and also to insert in the RECORD this data which has been prepared by the National Americanization Committee.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. MEEKER. Certainly.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does this report that you have in contemplation deal at all with the so-called Delbruck law of Germany?

Mr. MEEKER. In a way that is touched upon.

Mr. MONTAGUE. On the question of alien enemies voting in America?

Mr. MEEKER. No; this is purely the military status of the men; the other will come later. It has required about a year on one of these and two years on the other to get the data that we have, and we are going right ahead with it. It will be amended from time to time as we can get the further information.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to reinsert his speech, made some time ago, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, together with the data which he has referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I did not understand the gentleman to explain that there was any necessity for the reinsertion of his former speech.

The SPEAKER. He wants to get the two documents together.

Mr. MEEKER. This is only a short statement. I conferred with the Public Printer and he said it would be much more satisfactory, when prepared in pamphlet form, if the former speech was reinserted. That is the only reason.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman wishes to prepare it in the public form for private distribution?

Mr. MEEKER. Well, I will pay for it myself.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman wishes to get it in such shape that he can distribute it?

Mr. MEEKER. Yes. Every Member of the House has already received this copy. I sent one to every Member of the House and to every Member of the Senate, and also to the military and naval authorities. When this is published in pamphlet form one will be sent to every Member, but I will pay for it myself.

Mr. WINGO. About what number of these documents does the gentleman intend to distribute?

Mr. MEEKER. I can not state, but I suppose the first order will be five or six thousand. I do not ask that it be printed at the public expense.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman does not want it printed as a public document?

Mr. MEEKER. Not now; no, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS IN THE RECORD.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire a minute to make a unanimous-consent request. About two years ago in the Agricultural appropriation bill an amendment was adopted providing for an additional appropriation to make certain experiments for the extermination and control of the cotton-boll weevil. The station for those experiments is located at Tallulah, in my district. Recently an interesting report has been made in connection with that method which is of great interest and importance just at this time, and I desire to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the report. The experiments have been made in Tallulah, La.; Scott, Miss.; and Lake Village, Ark.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the document referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. What is the length of the document?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It is five pages of typewritten matter and a very important document.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. It is in relation to the new experiment?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Has not the department circulated this report?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It has not been published in full, but eventually it will be, in a bulletin.

Mr. WALSH. It is published as one of the reports from the Agricultural Department, is it not?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. This is not the report; this is the statement of facts based upon the report from the man in charge of this boll-weevil experiment work at these three stations.

Mr. WALSH. I thought the gentleman said that it was a report.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It is based on a report to the department of Agriculture from the people in charge. These experiments are usually published eventually in the form of bulletins, but it is very important at this time and is of great interest to the farmers especially.

Mr. WALSH. What is the importance of it at this time?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. It contains definite information as to how this money appropriated by Congress has been expended and as to the results obtained by this new method as to how to destroy and control the boll weevil.

Mr. WALSH. That is set forth in the report?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And the results obtained?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. It is a little unusual to print these agricultural reports in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but in view of the statement that this is of great importance at this time, I shall not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. This is a statement by the one who made the investigations and reported to the department?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes. This is a statement of the result of these experiments at these three stations.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. That statement, in the nature of a report, has been made to the department?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes. This is not the full report, but you might say that it is a bulletin issued in connection therewith.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The report has not yet been accepted or approved by the department, and the results have not been investigated further and verified by the department, so that they are or will be official?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. I was informed by the chief of the bureau that this was approved and the entire matter would be published eventually in the bulletin, but just at this time the information is important to the farmers in the South, and for that reason I ask to insert this in the RECORD at this time.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Does it not seem important that when this matter comes out finally after full verification and entire approval by the department that it should be full and official instead of a statement by the one who has made the recommendations and findings, which may not be accepted by the department?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. The gentleman evidently did not understand what I said or I have not made myself plain. What I intended to say was that this has the approval of the department; it is issued by the department. This comes from the department, stating the results obtained from the report made by the man in charge of the work; made by the specialist.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. I understood that it was a statement made by the gentleman who made the investigation. Now the gentleman says that it is a statement by the department.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. This is a report of the specialist in charge to the department, and has been embodied in this bulletin. That is what I intended to say, and it has been approved by the department, otherwise I would not care to have it placed in the RECORD in order to distribute if necessary.

Mr. ANDERSON. It has been printed by the department, has it not?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes. I do not know that it is in any official bulletin for distribution by the department.

Mr. ANDERSON. It could be so printed?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. As I stated, it will be printed and distributed as a bulletin sometime in the future, but this is a condensed statement of the facts showing the results of these investigations.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman say that these matters have been verified by the department and the conclusions of the investigator approved?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. So that this is in the nature of an official statement?

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF INFORMATION.

Control of the cotton-boll weevil seems to be in a fair way of accomplishment by the work of an entomologist of the Department of Agriculture.

When that insidious pest, which has been taking heavy toll of the cotton crop and annually extending his feeding grounds, stops his work of puncturing cotton squares and bolls, and ambles forth to quench his thirst from a dewdrop or raindrop on the cotton plant, he is likely in the future to encounter a poisoned draft which will be as effective as a knock-out drop. What this means to the cotton growers of the South and the industry as a whole can hardly be estimated in dollars and cents, but the curtailment of the weevil's activities, even in small part, is so important as to make the discovery by the United States Department of Agriculture of the fact that arsenicals may be used as a powder spray in controlling this pest one of its most striking and valuable contributions to the agricultural industry.

Mr. B. R. Coad, of the Bureau of Entomology, while working on some biological investigations of the boll weevil, found that although the weevils are not hard drinkers they drink regularly from the rain or dew collected in droplets on the leaves of the cotton plants. Having been on the trail of the cotton-boll weevil for some time, his logical inquiry was, "Why not poison the water which the weevils drink?" Since 1913, Mr. Coad, with a corps of entomologists with headquarters at Tallulah, La., has been experimenting with various poisons applied in different ways, all with the purpose of administering a dose which would be fatal to these insects which have invaded such a large part of the cotton-producing territory of the South. These entomologists have not finished their work, but they have proved by a series of experiments that boll weevils can be poisoned under field conditions and that the poisoning is a practical method of controlling the pests. The usual check plats have been used in these experiments, and the results have shown that yields of from 250 to 1,000 pounds more of seed cotton per acre can be raised on sprayed areas than on the unsprayed plats. The experiments have been conducted under many conditions and for several years, so as to give the method a complete trial before making the results known to the growers. The details are now being published in a department bulletin entitled "Recent Experimental Work in Poisoning Cotton Boll Weevils."

DETAILS WORKED OUT.

When the experiments were started again last year it was recognized that the former work had merely demonstrated the possibility of poisoning weevils successfully and that many phases of the economical use of the poison still remained to be worked out. A very elaborate series for that season was planned and about 75 tests were started in the neighborhood of Tallulah, each one intended to determine some particular point of importance. The earlier studies had shown that under certain conditions poisoning was profitable, but it was known that any change in these conditions might easily result in a much lower gain, if not an actual loss, and it was essential to determine thoroughly the possibilities and limitations of boll-weevil poisoning before the information would be of value to the public. A peculiar combination of seasonal conditions, however, resulted in an almost complete absence of weevil damage in all of the cotton in which tests had been planned. The experiments, therefore, could not be conducted under the desired conditions of heavy weevil infestation. Nevertheless, the results confirmed those of the preceding two years, but still left many gaps in the information essential to outlining a general procedure for weevil poisoning. On one of the heavily infested areas a gain was made of 50 per cent in the sprayed cotton over that grown on the unsprayed area.

A number of experiments were conducted also in the North Delta in Chicot County, near Lake Village, Ark., and in Washington County, near Scott, Miss. At both of these points a heavier infestation, due to different seasonal conditions, was encountered and pronounced results were obtained from the poison. In every case the experiments were conducted on comparatively small areas, subject to a continual influx of weevils from surrounding untreated cotton, but in spite of this a very definite weevil control resulted from poisoning. The open cotton in every case showed a definite gain to the last row of treatment. The gains per acre ranged from 250 pounds to 1,007 pounds of seed cotton. It is difficult, of course, to estimate how much larger these gains would have been if the entire cuts or entire plantations had been treated and thus the migration of weevils from the unpoisoned cotton prevented. It is clear, however, that the gains secured on the small areas were exceedingly conservative.

A LARGE FIELD TEST SUCCESSFUL.

A large-scale treatment was made in August last year on a section of an Arkansas plantation. The cotton grew on land of fair quality and was not planted until late May. Weather conditions had retarded the plants greatly and they did not start setting the crop until the latter part of July. About the middle of August a fair crop of bolls had developed, but the plants were large and leafy, and the weevils had multiplied so rapidly that a very heavy infestation of weevils was present. Blooming had practically ceased and the weevils had cleaned up the squares so thoroughly that they were attacking the bolls in great numbers, and all of the bolls, even to the largest present, were being riddled by punctures. It seemed probable that on one section no bolls would be left to open. It was, of course, too late to attempt to set a new crop by poisoning, but an effort was made to save the bolls then present on the plants. Treatments were given from August 23 to about September 1 on several hundred acres. Upon counting the squares it was found that about 86 per cent of the squares in the cotton to be poisoned had been weevil-punctured. This cotton was given a single poisoning, and about 10 days later it was found that the weevil infestation in these same cuts or areas had been reduced so that only 36 per cent of the squares were punctured. During the same period the infestation in the adjoining unpoisoned cotton had been increasing steadily. Practically all of the poisoned cuts started blooming again at this time and a number of them reached what is ordinarily termed the "flower-garden" stage of blooming, five to seven blooms per plant on a single day being not at all rare.

In starting the treatment of this large area it had been anticipated that several applications would be necessary to produce the desired result, but the effect of a single application was so pronounced that it seemed unnecessary to repeat it. The weevils had been so reduced that only 36 per cent of the squares were punctured, and although thousands of weevils were being bred out from the squares on the ground or were coming in from other plantations every day, it was still obvious that the weevils would greatly reduce their attacks on the bolls until they had caught up with the squares then present, and that this period would be long enough to allow the bolls to become sufficiently hardened to avoid weevil damage. Owing to the necessity for poisoning considerable areas in this case and to the inability to leave unpoisoned plats as checks, it was, of course, impossible to determine the exact benefit derived from the treatment. Rough comparisons, however, based on yields of surrounding cuts, made it obvious that a considerable gain had been secured and that poisoning had been a very profitable operation.

POISONS AND TIME OF APPLICATION.

In the early experiments the triplumbic form of lead arsenate was used, but was not sufficiently effective, and the dihydrogen form of lead arsenate proved to be a better poison for the work. Later additional tests demonstrated that a high grade of calcium arsenate was still more effective and has the great advantage of being cheaper than lead arsenate. A number of tests were made with various mixtures and dilutions of arsenicals. This work, however, is still in the experimental stage and, according to Mr. Coad, it is difficult to prophesy just what the results will be. It is obvious, however, according to the scientist, that either a dihydrogen lead arsenate powder containing not less than 32 per cent of arsenic pentoxid or a calcium arsenate containing at least 42 per cent of arsenic pentoxid will produce an effective control if handled properly. It also is expected that it will be possible to dilute these considerably with some cheap carrier, such as lime, though this has not been definitely determined. The experiments have shown that a very fine powder is taken up more readily by the dew and held in suspension for the weevils than coarsely powdered chemicals. This physical condition is especially important, since the poison is applied in the form of a dust spray.

The time of applying the poison, of course, varies under different conditions. It has proved most effective when applied just as the cotton obviously slackens in blooming, but further work along this line is still to be done. It seems probable that the effective interval between applications is about one week. It is well known that much more effective poisoning with dry dust can be done while the dew is on the plant, as the poison not only clings to the plant better but has much less tendency to drift from the cotton. The most effective time for application, therefore, usually is between 4 p. m. and 9 a. m. Several machines are on the market for dust spraying. In the early experiments a hand dust gun was used, with which it was possible to cover 4 to 5 acres a day. In order to cover larger areas, however, a special power machine was developed which will cover nearly 200 acres per day. The department now expects to develop an intermediate type which can be sold cheaply and which will cover 20 to 30 acres per day.

The amount of poison required for application so far has depended more upon the requirements of the machinery used than on the amount necessary for thoroughly dusting the cotton. In general, about 5 pounds per acre have been applied, but this is excessive, and, with further improvement in the machinery and the use of the poison with mixtures such as lime, smaller amounts will be effective. In most of the experiments from 3 to 5 applications were made, but the effectiveness of these was considerably reduced by the fact that they were on such small plats. In the large-scale experiment the effect of a single application was as great as was secured from about three applications on a smaller plat. This more efficient work on the large field was due, of course, to the fact that there was practically no migration of weevils from adjoining areas. The cost of treatment averaged about $1 per acre for each application. This, however, may be reduced considerably when large areas are sprayed and when improved machinery requiring less poison is employed. The cost may be still further reduced when it is possible to mix the poison with other powders, such as lime, which will act as carriers. Further, it will rarely be necessary to poison an entire plantation to control the weevils, since on emerging in the spring they always concentrate near the area in which they passed the winter. The weevils remain rather closely at these points until they have multiplied sufficiently to threaten a shortage in the local food supply. For this reason a great part of the cotton is not seriously infested with weevils until some time after midseason, and then not often until well along in August.

The control measures adopted must depend upon conditions in each plantation, but by concentrating on the more heavily infested cuts just before the weevils become sufficiently abundant to migrate to the remainder of the cotton it will be possible not only directly to benefit the cotton treated but to protect the remainder of the plantation by preventing the weevil migration. In this way the cost of the treatment for a comparatively few acres will be borne by the benefit derived by the entire plantation.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries.

DEPARTMENT EMPLOYEES SUBJECT TO MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. Have responses been received from all of the departments and governmental divisions to which these resolutions of inquiry touching the matter of exemptions and deferred classifications were addressed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer. He will have the Clerk look it up and see.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. We have to take some course to dispose of them.

The SPEAKER. Yes. There are so many of them, and there are some supplemental reports, that the Chair will have to ask the Clerk to examine and have the matter determined.

PENSIONS.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I call up the bill (S. 4194) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas calls up an omnibus pension bill for present consideration, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws—

The name of William Colpetzer, late of Company D, Forty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of David Craft, late of Company G, Thirteenth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Hezekiah Dixson, late of Company G, Fifty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Josiah H. H. Feather, late of Company A, Seventh Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Uriah P. Getz, late of Company I, One hundred and ninety-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $25 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Simeon L. Coen, late of Company B, First Battalion Nevada Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Hugh L. Eyler, late of Company A, Sixtieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Daniel R. Cokeley, late of Company A, Fifteenth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of George B. Douglass, late of Company D, Sixth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Jacob J. Lee, late of Company C, Sixth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and Battery F, First Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Light Artillery, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Samuel McAtee, late of Company B, Third Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and Company B, Sixth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Levi Morris, late of Company C, Seventh Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Benjamin Taylor, late of Company M, First Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $25 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of James W. Toothman, late of Company A, Thirteenth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Christopher C. Stemple, late of Company F, Fifteenth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Frederick J. Young, late of Company C, First Regiment Mississippi Volunteer Mounted Rifles, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Henry Harrison, alias Thomas Carman, late of Company G, One hundred and fifty-eighth Regiment, and Company F, One hundredth Regiment, New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Samuel J. Evans, late of Company B, Seventy-fifth Regiment, and Company B, Forty-second Regiment, Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $36 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The name of Samuel Cook, late of Company A, Second Regiment District of Columbia Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Page 32, line 13, strike out "$50" and insert "$40" (Joseph O. Swigert).

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I wish to be heard on that committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I have known Joseph O. Swigert for 20 years. He was pensioned until two years ago at the rate under the original law of $50. Some one made objection. He is old and feeble and has no control over his bowels, no way of making a living, and he is destitute, and he requires constant attention because of his lack of control of his bowels. He does not need a nurse all the time, but he has somebody with him all the time for that reason. I think his pension should be restored to what it was under the general law and that he be given $50, which was given him up until two years ago, when the reduction was made.

Mr. SHOUSE. May I inquire of the gentleman why it was reduced?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. It was reduced by the construction of the department on a complaint of some one who did not like him.

Mr. SHOUSE. In view of that statement, Mr. Speaker, I ask to withdraw the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman withdraws the committee amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a committee amendment to be added at the end of the bill, page 35, following line 12.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill insert the following:

"The name of Henrietta Schmidt, former widow of Peter Eberle, late of Company B, Thirty-seventh Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $25 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman the reason for this amendment.

Mr. SHOUSE. I will be glad to give it to the gentleman. This is a bill of Gen. SHERWOOD, the chairman of the committee. It was passed in a House bill, and was eliminated through a mistake by the examiner on the part of the Senate committee. He thought he had information from the Pension Bureau that this lady was already receiving $25 per month. He himself has since found that was mistaken information, and for that reason the amendment is being offered.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHOUSE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill S. 4543.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4543. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report it by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 4543) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHOUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment (offered by Mr. SHOUSE): Page 7, strike out lines 19 to 22, inclusive. (Pension of Samuel M. Bailey.)

Page 10, strike out lines 10 to 12, inclusive. (Pension of Eliza Dalton.)

Page 14, line 17, strike out "$50" and insert in lieu thereof "$40." (Pension of Stephen R. Clark.)

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHOUSE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes.

BASTILLE DAY A NATIONAL HOLIDAY.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (No. 314) declaring Sunday, July 14, 1918, to be a national holiday.

The joint resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, we have never declared any national holiday by law, even for events happening in our own history, and Congress has not declared any holidays except in the District of Columbia. While, of course, we all appreciate the spirit of the French people, and how nice it would be to commemorate this great event, we ought not to pass a resolution such as this without consideration. Therefore I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman reserve it for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. For a moment.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Fourth of July was celebrated throughout France.

Mr. WALSH. And we can celebrate the 14th of July throughout America without declaring it to be a national holiday.

Mr. BARKLEY. The French Government participated officially in that celebration.

Mr. WALSH. We can participate officially in the celebration of the 14th of July.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Kentucky yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Would it not be better if the resolution were in some different form? It occurs to me under the circumstances that the House might be inclined to pass some sort of a resolution suggesting the celebration of the Fall of the Bastille and expressing our sympathy with France in that celebration. But, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] has just suggested, this is a very unusual form of resolution. Of course, it has no binding effect. It assumes to do something we have no authority to do.

Mr. BARKLEY. This does not provide for any permanent celebration from year to year. It simply designates one day—next Sunday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. I object.

DAILY PRAYER FOR VICTORY.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker lay before the House Senate joint resolution 164.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 164. Now, if there is going to be any row about this, I want the gentleman from California to withdraw it.

Mr. RAKER. If there is going to be a row, I will get out of it and withdraw it. I would like to be in it, though.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to know what it is.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Military Affairs from consideration of Senate joint resolution 164 and asks for its present consideration. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The resolution is as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 164) requesting the President to commend by proclamation to the people of the United States observance of the practice of prayer at noon each day for victory in the war.

Whereas what is called the angelus, the practice of prayer for one minute at noon each day for the success of our country in the existing war, is being observed in the District of Columbia and some other parts of the United States; and

Whereas it is the desire of some good citizens that it be observed generally throughout the country to the end of the war; and

Whereas the sentiment is in accord with the traditional spirit and sentiment of this country and recognizes the overruling power of the Almighty: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President is requested to commend by proclamation to the people of the United States observance in their homes and elsewhere, until the end of the war, of the practice of prayer to God for at least one minute at noon each day for victory for our cause in the existing war.

Mr. WALSH. I am going to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts objects.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the water-power bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 56, noes 3.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. On this vote the ayes are 56 and the noes 3, and the gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of order there is no quorum present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419 will, as their names are called, answer "yea" and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 209, nays 4, answered "present" 4, not voting 215, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. BROWNING, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence indefinitely, on account of important business.

WATER-POWER LEGISLATION.

The SPEAKER. The House resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419, with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] in the chair.

Thereupon the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419, with Mr. WEBB in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1419, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], if he has not concluded his remarks, is recognized. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, while I have no desire or disposition to urge the passage of this bill without proper and due consideration, I hope that we may continuously consider it and pass it as early as we can, consistent with due consideration, and I am now going to finish my opening statement.

While I do not object to having questions asked me, many questions will naturally arise in the reading of the bill by paragraphs in the amendment stage, and I would be glad if gentlemen who have questions that they wish to ask that will apply more properly when we consider the bill by paragraphs for amendment would withhold their inquiries until that time.

Mr. COLLIER. Has any agreement been reached with reference to general debate on this bill?

Mr. SIMS. Not yet.

Mr. COLLIER. You have never set any time when you expect to close general debate?

Mr. SIMS. No; no time has been agreed on.

Mr. Chairman, when I closed my remarks—or, rather, when I ceased to continue my remarks—on Tuesday, I had not covered anything like the general scope and purposes of the bill. As I said, or intended to say, before, this bill, in its terms and in its provisions, provides for all kinds of water-power development. Consequently there is something in the bill that almost every Member favors. Some Members are interested in the development of water power in the forest reserves. Therefore, the provisions of the bill applying to forest reserves are of special interest to them. Those interested in the public lands are likewise specially interested. Those who are interested in water-power development on the navigable rivers are also specially interested in that part of the bill. In theory the bill is also very latitudinous, very broad, covering all subjects and projects of water-power development and all questions arising thereon.

I think—and I do not say it because I happen to be a member of the committee or its chairman—but I really think it is one of the most comprehensive and one of the best water-power bills that has ever been reported to the House, and in saying that I do not say it can not be made better by amendment. I do not say that I approve every detail of the bill, or every paragraph; but it is a bill that we ought to pass, and I do hope that Members of the House who are interested in the bill and want to know its provisions will not absent themselves the very moment we begin to consider it. If they do, the consideration in general debate will be a failure, so far as a majority of the House is concerned, and then it will take very much longer to consider the bill in the amendment stage under the five-minute rule, because the questions that are discussed in general debate arise in the minds of Members at the time, and not having given attention to the general debate and not knowing what has been discussed in it, they are anxious to know, when we are under the five-minute rule, what they would in general debate have learned; at least, they would have knowledge of the position of the committee or of members of the committee if they had remained in the Hall during general debate.

This bill provides for unlimited, unrestricted development and operation of water-power projects by the United States Government. This appears in section 7, in the last portion of it, and I will read that at this time, because it is very short and covers what I have just stated. The latter paragraph of section 7 is as follows:

That whenever, in the judgment of the commission, the development of any project should be undertaken by the United States itself, the commission shall not approve any application for such project by any citizen, association, corporation, State, or municipality, but shall cause to be made such examinations, surveys, reports, plans, and estimates of cost of the project as it may deem necessary, and shall submit its findings to Congress with such recommendations as it may deem appropriate concerning the construction of such project by the United States.

Those who believe in Federal Government ownership and operation of water-power projects will find what they believe in provided for not only in principle but to some extent in detail in the bill. So those people who care more for United States Government ownership than they do for the other provisions of the bill have a provision in the bill that, I imagine, will meet with their hearty approval.

The bill further provides for limited, conditional, and restricted development and operation of such projects by the State governments. Therefore those who believe that projects of this kind should be owned, developed, and operated by the States in which the projects are located have State ownership and operation provided for in the bill.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Let me finish stating the general scope of the bill and then I will yield. The bill further provides for limited, conditional, and restricted development and operation of such projects by municipalities. So those who believe in cities or other municipalities owning water-power projects have their views provided for in the bill. The power given to the United States Government to develop, own, and operate projects of this kind is without any limit or restriction whatever, except as to the consent of Congress and the appropriation of the necessary funds. Of course, no permit can be given to the Government of the United States by the commission, because its sovereignty over this question is of the highest in degree and form. The States have a qualified and limited right; that is, they must first obtain a license from the commission; but the right of the States is made preferential as against private individuals and corporations. The municipality—that is, a city, a county, or some other form of municipal government—has exactly the same kind of preferential right. It must have permission from the commission. Therefore it is given restricted and limited municipal ownership.

The bill provides for limited, conditional, restricted, and regulated development and operation of such projects by private corporations and by private persons or individuals or copartnerships. So we have in effect and in principle Government ownership and operation in all forms, but not exclusive in any, and we have private corporation, individual, or copartnership ownership and operation, limited, restricted, and regulated. That is the entire scope of the bill. All the rest of the bill relates more or less to details of the application of these fundamental propositions. Now I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LONDON. As between the State and a private corporation, the commission are to prefer the State government, are they?

Mr. SIMS. It will have the power, and it is practically mandatory that it shall do so.

Mr. LONDON. That they shall?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. As between private capital and the Nation, however, the commission have no power except to make an investigation and to report the facts to Congress, with the suggestion that Congress may act?

Mr. SIMS. I do not understand it to be that kind of a limitation, because Congress would have to make an appropriation; and when the commission deems it in the public interest that the United States should develop, own, and operate a project it will make a report to Congress, giving its reason for coming to that conclusion, with its recommendations, so that Congress may provide the means with which to do it, because the commission has no power to make an appropriation or make a charge upon the Treasury.

Mr. LONDON. The point I am driving at is this, that as between State governments and private capital the commission is not only authorized but directed to give preference to the States as against private capital.

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. But when the issue arises between the Nation and private capital, then the bill limits the power of the commission to investigation and to recommendation to Congress. Is not that correct?

Mr. SIMS. No; not as stated by the gentleman. It provides that the commission shall withhold any permit applied for by a State, municipal corporation, or private interests on any particular project and make report with recommendation. The United States is not in a position to make formal application for permission to its own commission. Therefore in such a case the commission will refuse to grant the license and present the project to Congress, with a statement of its reasons why the project should be developed by the United States Government. It is not presented for the approval of Congress, except in the sense that nothing could be done by the commission in development of the project if Congress did not approve of it and provide the necessary appropriation. But it must be presumed that if the commission refuses a permit for the development of any particular project for the reason that it deems it to be in the public interest that the Government should develop, own, and operate it, that Congress would in all probability make the necessary appropriation.

Mr. DOREMUS. I think what the gentleman from New York desires to know is whether there is any power in this bill under which the Federal Government could develop one of these water-power projects.

Mr. LONDON. Exactly. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Michigan for helping me out by stating the question so clearly.

Mr. DOREMUS. Of course the chairman of the committee knows that there is a very clear answer to that. There is no such power in the bill.

Mr. SIMS. It is absolutely true that the commission has no power under this bill to proceed on its own motion, on its own initiative, to develop and operate a project independent of further action by Congress in the way I have just stated.

Mr. LONDON. Congress does not confer upon anybody the power to organize or to run any water-power development on behalf of the Government?

Mr. SIMS. No; not without special legislation for that purpose.

Mr. LONDON. It would require special legislation?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly; but the power to prevent its being developed by State, municipal, or private corporations is clear. I am assuming that the public reasons which will move the commission to withhold a license will also induce Congress to provide the money that may be necessary.

Mr. LONDON. Will the gentleman please state what are the fundamental points of difference between the House bill and the Senate bill?

Mr. SIMS. I have not gone into that with a view of trying to state exactly the difference. One of the fundamentals is that the bill as reported provides for a license for not exceeding 50 years. I am more familiar with the Senate bill that passed in the last Congress than with this one, because I was a member of the conference committee; but as I recall it the Senate bill does not provide for any charge to be made by the Government of the United States for the water used or the power produced, but the Senate bill applies only to navigable rivers. As I understood it, the Senate took the position that the Government had no property rights in the water or the power resulting from it, as a dam built upon a navigable stream with the consent of the Government for the purpose of improving navigation.

Therefore the Senate has in substance held that we have no right or power to impose a charge for the water power created by navigation dams built at the expense of private corporations or individuals acting under permit to do so. That is one of the fundamental differences, but I do not regard the unlimited 50 years as a very real difference in principle. Our substitute bill, which we have reported, says not exceeding 50 years. Nearly every bill that has heretofore been before Congress has assumed that 50 years is the normal period.

Mr. LONDON. The Senate bill provides 50 years.

Mr. SIMS. A flat 50 years. And the House bill says not exceeding 50 years.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. ALMON. I would be glad to have the chairman give his views on the question whether he thinks the National Government has any interest and should be paid for the use of water on navigable streams where the navigation dams are put in by private capital with the permission of the United States or the War Department.

Mr. SIMS. I have very positive views on that question and I do not hesitate to give them. Private capital is doing whatever it does do as the agent of the Government of the United States. There is no question that if the Government constructs a dam for navigation purposes and water power results from such Government expenditure that the Government has the right to charge for that water power. Then when the Government says to you or to me or to a corporation, "You may make this improvement which the Government has the right and duty to make for the benefit of navigation, and we give you certain benefits in lieu of interest on the money that you put into this project." What is it that we do? We give the applicant an opportunity to make all he can out of this project in compliance with and under such conditions as we impose in the license. Usually it has been done by special act of Congress in each project. In this bill it will be done by permit of the commission without a special act. The Government has the right to do by an agent what it can do itself. It is a voluntary matter on the part of the private developer. The private developer does not have to do it, there is no compulsion placed upon him, we can not force him to do it and then make a charge for what he produces. There is no question that the United States Government has the right to make the charge. In fact, the Government has the right to make the charge because it has the right to make the development and sell the power directly as a means of reimbursing itself for the expenditure, and would have absolute control of the price or charge made for the power disposed of by it. Therefore it has the right and power if any applicant seeks for his own profit or his own benefit to make the development, that he must do it under such limitations and conditions as the Government places on him, and which are set out in and made a part of the license.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What has been the policy of the War Department in reference to fixed charges against water power or enterprises constructed by private capital?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think the War Department has ever authorized the construction of any dams of that kind; it has always been done by act of Congress.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. MAYS. Does the gentleman believe that the right of the Government extends to nonnavigable streams?

Mr. SIMS. Not unless they are on Government land. There is no attempt in this bill to have the Government exercise any power whatever except on navigable streams and streams on public lands. The Government, of course, can levey a tax on anything. The new revenue bill can levy a tax on every water power in the country, but that would be a tax for revenue purposes, and not a charge in the sense provided for in this bill.

Mr. MAYS. That would not be under the right to exercise control over the water power?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. MAYS. The jurisdiction of the Government does not extend over such waters as are owned by the State government?

Mr. SIMS. Streams within the States and not navigable and not on Government lands are not subject to Government jurisdiction or control.

Mr. MAYS. What is the construction of the gentleman of that phrase which speaks of navigable streams and parts of navigable streams?

Mr. SIMS. Some are navigable a part of the way and not all the way; some are navigable for 100 miles and then occurs a break, and then headwater navigation exists beyond the obstruction and the head of the stream.

Mr. MAYS. And the Government control extends only over that part which is navigable?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; or to any tributary the obstruction of which would impair the navigability of the navigable portion of the river. That was fully discussed the other day in my remarks made in my opening statement.

Mr. MAYS. But the gentleman's speech is not in the RECORD.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, yes; it is.

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. I do not think the chairman has answered my question and probably because I did not make it plain enough. I would like to ask the chairman if he believes that the National Government has any interest in navigable streams except for navigation purposes?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman means property interest?

Mr. ALMON. Yes; property interest,

Mr. SIMS. I would not say that it had title in the sense of owning the water itself. But whenever you have to have Government consent to do anything the person seeking the consent must accept the terms imposed by the Government as a condition of the consent given.

Mr. ALMON. Let me put it another way: Does the gentleman think the National Government has any right to charge a royalty for the use of water power in the navigable streams where the National Government has permitted private capital to put in a dam the result of which improves navigation and develops water power?

Mr. SIMS. If the license is issued giving permission to do so on the conditions expressed and set out in the license, there is no doubt about it, in my judgment.

Mr. ALMON. The gentleman is evading my question, of course not intentionally, I am sure.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no.

Mr. ALMON. I am asking if the Government has it as a matter of right.

Mr. SIMS. Constitutional right?

Mr. ALMON. As a matter of legal right, has the National Government any property rights in it other than for navigation purposes?

Mr. SIMS. I would not think the National Government could take possession of the water and sell it or divert it from the channel of the river to the injury of private owners below the dam without making just compensation to all parties for any injury or damage sustained.

Mr. ALMON. If the National Government has no interest in navigable streams, except for the purposes of navigation, then is it not a fact that the United States Government has no right or authority or power to charge a royalty for the use of water power developed on a navigable stream by permission of the Gvernment which results in the improvement of navigation and the development of water power?

Mr. SIMS. I think the Government has a perfect right to make it a condition on which the permit shall be issued.

Mr. ALMON. Then the gentleman has answered it in the affirmative, that, in his opinion, the Government has that right to charge.

Mr. SIMS. It has the power under the provisions of this bill; that is, under the provisions of the proposed substitute.

Mr. LONDON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. LONDON. Is not one of the very elements of property the right to control the thing in which we possess property?

Mr. SIMS. I think so.

Mr. LONDON. As long as the Government has that property, it exercises the power which ordinarily goes with the possession of property.

Mr. SIMS. I think so.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I am afraid that the House will tire of hearing me.

Mr. SINNOTT. I desire to call to the recollection of the gentleman the decision in the case of Chandler-Dunbar, where the Supreme Court held that the Government had a right to charge for the surplus water power that might be developed there, although I understand in that case the Government itself proposed to construct the dam, and in that case I think the Government secured by condemnation title to the bed of the stream and to the banks.

Mr. SIMS. The Chandler-Dunbar case, as I recall, is included in the hearings, and naturally I supposed that Members have that case in their minds when asking questions.

Mr. LONDON. Every piece of land which is not private property is public property. Is not that so?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; but sometimes I hear land called "No Man's Land."

Mr. LONDON. No Man's Land is now under the control of several international interests, but within the territory of a nation whatever land is not private property is public property.

Mr. SIMS. Undoubtedly that is so as a general proposition.

Mr. LONDON. If the navigable rivers are not privately owned, they are necessarily publicly owned. Let us get down to fundamentals, for we are dealing with things as God created them.

Mr. SIMS. The contention has been made that the Government of the United States has no interest in navigable waters within a State, except to prevent any obstruction to navigation.

Mr. LONDON. Let us get down to the basis of things.

Mr. SIMS. It is a legal question. The Chandler-Dunbar case seems to me to settle it very much along the line of the gentleman's contention.

Mr. LONDON. Oh, certainly; for no good Supreme Court judge could disagree with me in my reasoning upon fundamentals. I am sure of that.

Mr. SIMS. Here is a water power that arises out of the improvement of a navigable river for navigation purposes. The Government of the United States is charged with the duty of maintaining navigation. Therefore, as a means of maintaining navigation it may do it by locks and dams, and from the dam thus built, which no one questions the right of the Government to construct, and which is made necessary if that plan of improvement be adopted, a profitable water power is created, which may be used primarily as a water-power project, or it may be used for the purpose of generating electricity, which electricity takes the place of water power, because, as I explained the other day, it is easier of transmission, and in that way water power and the hydroelectric power are purely by-products of the chief purpose of the improvement of the stream for navigation. This chief purpose is to improve navigation and to maintain it, and when the Government does so at its own expense it certainly is entitled to anything and everything that grows out of the improvement, financially or otherwise, and the Government can, therefore, charge for this power. It has a perfect right to charge. The power is a by-product, pure and simple, and is not the chief or primary object of improving the river.

Mr. MAYS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MAYS. Would that theory also apply to the nonnavigable streams upon the public domain?

Mr. SIMS. If the lands upon which the power site rests are owned by the Government of the United States, then it owns to the top and the bottom of the river and upon both sides, and has all of the elements of proprietorship that anyone could have, and it can do as it pleases with its own.

Mr. MAYS. How about the water?

Mr. SIMS. The Government can develop the water power and operate it.

Mr. MAYS. And use the water?

Mr. SIMS. And sell the current or sell the products made from the current.

Mr. MAYS. And use the water which belongs to the States?

Mr. SIMS. Oh, I am not going into that question. I know the question out there that you gentlemen have is one on which you are very much better advised, and I do not undertake to settle it. I am yielding the discussion of every question touching water-power rights upon the public domain to the members of the Public Lands Committee, six of whom are members of this committee. I am leaving the discussion of public-land questions to them.

Mr. SINNOTT. I might direct the attention of the gentleman to the decision in the case of the Utah Power Co., where the Supreme Court held that any charge or any condition might be imposed, not for the use of the water, but for the use of the land contiguous to the water.

Mr. MAYS. I understand the case; that is a question of the right of pipe lines to cross the public domain.

Mr. SINNOTT. The right to make this use of the public land.

Mr. MAYS. I want to ask the chairman of the committee one further question. If a private individual owned land on both sides of a navigable stream, he would own the sites to the bottom. It would be the gentleman's theory that he would have the right to do whatever he pleased with the water flowing over his land without making any further arrangement with any power whatsoever?

Mr. SIMS. He could not impair navigation.

Mr. MAYS.. I am sepaking of a nonnavigable stream.

Mr. SIMS. Yes; unless he violates some law of the State or Nation.

Mr. MAYS. He would have to get some permission from the State government to use the water, even though he owned land on both sides to the bottom of the stream.

Mr. SIMS. Well, I understand there is a very different law that applies in the West to that on the Atlantic or eastern part of our country. Out there the right depends upon the appropriation of the water itself rather than what we call the riparian rights, growing out of the ownership of the banks of the river and the lands to the center of the stream. I shall ask the gentleman to pardon me; I am not prepared as I ought to be to go into that question as fully as I would like. Where the States have laws, jurisdictions, and rights and the Government has laws, jurisdictions, and rights, both have to be compiled with, as far as not conflicting.

Mr. MAYS. I am simply undertaking to adopt the gentleman's illustration a while ago of the power exercised by the Government if it owns the land over which a nonnavigable stream flows with the property rights of an individual who might also own land over which a nonnavigable stream flows. You are giving in your statement power to the General Government that a private owner would not be allowed to exercise.

Mr. SIMS. Where the Government owns the land on both sides of a river, I can see no limitation, only such limitations as Congress imposes on the Government itself in reference to such streams.

Mr. MAYS. We have such limitations in all the public-land States.

Mr. SIMS. Well, I will say to the gentleman I am going to leave the discussion of that matter entirely to gentlemen who are familiar with it. Now, I want to go into the question of the importance and practicability of developing hydraulic power upon the navigable rivers of the whole country not situated upon public lands. We have gone into the question to some extent as to whether or not the Government of the United States ought to do the developing; also the question as to its power to do the developing, and whether or not it shall surrender its right temporarily to private interests to do for the Government what ought to be done in this regard. There is no question about its power to do so; not a particle. I want to read you what was said by a very competent gentleman, a very competent man on this subject, as to the amount and the cost of improvements on navigable rivers by either public or private capital, and the number of miles of navigable waters that require improvement by canalization. Water power does not arise only where locks and dams are made necessary; only where navigation dams are of sufficient height to develop a water power sufficient to justify its installation as a matter of industrial interest. I now read from a statement by Mr. Leighton, consulting engineer, Washington, D. C., who spent many years in the Government service and who is a man of ability and learning, and has been recognized, as far as my knowledge goes, as an authority on the questions that are pertinent to the present inquiry. I will read from his testimony as to the amount of development that can be brought about in the navigable streams of the country as a result of improvement for navigation purposes. On page 477 of the hearings, part 1, Mr. Leighton says, in commenting upon the statement made by Mr. Townley:

> While I would not go as far as Mr. Townley did in asserting that the bill that is before you will not permit the development of a large number of water powers, I can not, as an engineer who has become more or less familiar with the steam power versus water power question, fail to appreciate the profound engineering point made by Mr. Townley, namely, that from the standpoint of economy and efficiency steam power is going to overshadow hydroelectric power to a degree that will astonish the layman. Of course Mr. Townley spoke from an engineering standpoint, and in reviewing his testimony it may help you in your appraisal of his statements to know that, although he did not mention the fact, Mr. Townley is chairman of the power committee of the engineering council. That council is far and away the highest and most authoritative engineering body in the world. A seat in that council is secured only by actual attainment and achievement, and the seats are few in number. In fact, a seat in that council is regarded by engineers in the same way that lawyers regard a seat in the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. Townley said in the opening of his statement:

> I would like, if you please, to speak of this subject not on a war basis, but on a peace basis, because the development of water power takes quite a while, and unless the war should be drawn out to last a very long time it would be difficult to develop any very large number of water powers and have them in operation in time to be of service in the war.
>
> The introduction of electricity as a means for transmitting power over considerable distances and its subsequent rapid development completely changed the status of hydraulic power. Previously such power could only be used near falling water. Now it is commercially available in convenient form within a radius, in some instances, up to 200 miles—a fact that has made it possible to utilize water powers even when located in remote and inaccessible places. Indeed, to-day practically all hydraulic developments of any magnitude are hydroelectric.
> Along with improvements in the art of electrical transmission have come equally rapid developments in the application of electricity. Electric light has become almost the universal illuminant. Electric motors largely drive our factories and propel all our street cars. They have made substantial progress in replacing steam locomotives on some large railroads, while the manufacture of nitrogenous products for explosives and fertilizers and of such products as abrasives and aluminum depends for its commercial success on electrochemistry. In an endeavor to supply the demand for electric current thus created large central generating stations have been established in or near all large centers of population.
> In the light of the foregoing it might seem reasonable to suppose that a large proportion of the modern demand for electric current would be supplied from the energy in falling water. Such, however, is not the case. Accurate statistics are difficult to obtain, but some approximate totals may prove illuminating. It has been estimated by a careful engineer that in 1911 there were over 26,000,000 steam-engine horsepower capacity in use (including railroad locomotives) in the United States. Making liberal allowances for correction in these several figures, it seems probable that there are in service from four to five times as many steam as water horsepower, and that there are still undeveloped water horsepower equal at least to twice that of all the steam capacity in service. Some of the undeveloped power sites are too remote from any market to be now utilized, and an uncertain number are not commercial prospects; but, even so, it is clear that the possibilities of the additional development are very great.

As has been brought out by previous testimony, no accurate estimate of the total amount of hydraulic power is obtainable, but the figure most frequently used for all the water power in the United States is probably 60,000,000 horsepower. I make that statement with a reservation, because it is based on admittedly meager information, but I know of no better figure to use.

The United States census in 1912 gave 4,870,000 horsepower of this hydraulic power developed; and Mr. Merrill's report, which the Secretary of Agriculture presented in January, 1916, estimated that this total had been increased to six and a half millions.

There are two fundamental causes which have militated against the substitution of hydroelectric for steam-electric power. One is economic and permanent; the other is statutory, and therefore subject to modification. Both reasons apply to some powers, but neither, fortunately, to all. The economic and permanent reason is high cost of development, due to natural conditions. Electric power generated by falling water is inferior to that generated by steam in every particular except cost, and therefore water-driven service must be cheaper than steam-driven in order to justify its existence.

The price for service depends primarily on cost, and cost divides itself naturally into two main items, namely, operation (including maintenance) and fixed charges. As a hydroelectric plant consumes no fuel, its operating cost is less than that of an equivalent steam-driven plant. On the other hand, a steam plant only costs usually from one-fifth to one-half as much per unit of capacity as a hydroelectric plant, so that the latter must carry very much heavier fixed charges.

The disability of water service is usually even greater than the ratio of the costs of two equivalent complete developments. A power enterprise seldom comes into being with a market for its entire ultimate output. Therefore, when steam is to be the motive power only such capacity is installed as initial demands require and the cost per unit is fairly proportional to that of the ultimate development. In a water development, on the contrary, a large part of the cost is for riparian rights, for the dam, impounding reservoir, flume, forebay, etc., and for the transmission right of way, towers, etc., which must at the start be largely provided and constructed for the complete installation. The obvious result is a greater fixed charge per unit of capacity and a higher cost per horsepower delivered for sale.

In forecasting the commercial prospects of a power enterprise the possible market must be studied and, of course, a sale price for power decided upon. As this price is controlled by the cost of similar service from other sources, usually from steam, and as it must be attractive from the start, the additional burden of fixed charges on the initial part of a hydroelectric installation frequently forces the sale of its power below cost. The projectors of the enterprise then must rely for success on a sufficient subsequent increase in their markets. The possibility of an incorrect forecast of the extent of such increase and of the time when it may come imposes a serious business hazard against water and in favor of steam.

It has been frequently pointed out that, as the Nation's coal supply is depleted, the cost of coal must rise, thus increasing the cost of steam-electric power as a competitor and raising the market value of hydro-electric power accordingly. The rising price of coal is a matter of record, but it is not so generally known that the improved efficiency of steam-producing machinery (boilers, engines, generators, and auxiliaries) has more than kept pace, so that the net cost of producing electric power from coal has steadily declined. As applied to the prewar period it may be stated that over a period of 10 years the cost of coal has risen on an average 1 per cent per year, while the cost of electric power produced from coal has fallen on an average 2½ per cent per year. In addition to these facts—still referring to prewar conditions—the cost of steam-electric generating equipment has been greatly reduced. This fact is due partly to the introduction and subsequent improvement of the steam turbine, and in part to the great increase in the size of the units now available.

There is nothing to indicate that the limit of improvement in the design of steam prime movers has been reached or is even in sight. It is, therefore, a reasonable assumption that further advances in the art will continue to occur and to cut down both the fixed charges and the operating cost of steam power as a competitor of water. The largest modern steam turbine has now some twelve times the capacity which the largest reciprocating engine had 15 years ago. Stated another way, the cost of a steam-electric plant per unit of capacity just before the war was about one-third what it was 15 years previous, while the energy it produces per pound of coal has increased 50 per cent.

Mr. Leighton spoke of that matter because Mr. Townley had discussed the probable amount of steam power produced by use of coal that will compete with hydroelectric power. As to the probable amount of water power that can be developed on the navigable streams he says:

The United States had paid up to June 30, 1916, to establish and maintain navigable waterways in the rivers and harbors of the country $898,543,252.47. Of this amount there has been spent on the nontidal portions of our rivers, aggregating about 18,500 miles, $277,000,000. The greater portion of that mileage is in rivers and bayous of low slope where the cost per mile of improvement and maintenance for the depths achieved is relatively low. On those parts of our navigable streams which by reason of their high slope are suitable for water-power development, a total length of 4,200 miles, the amount expended by the United States was about $71,500,000. Now, it is an astonishing fact that on none of those streams or parts of streams is there any assured navigable capacity such as is necessary to beget confidence in and habitual use of waterway routes by shippers, except along those stretches where the United States or private capital has made canalization improvements. Of course these navigation projects have been modified from time to time and in many ways, with an ultimate loss of a very large sum of money. In practically every case the reason for modification or abandonment has been that the ruling navigable depths that could be achieved for a reasonable expenditure were not sufficient to promote or to make possible the productive use of the rivers for transportation.

You are familiar with the fact that these rivers of high slope can be improved somewhat by the so-called open-channel methods, but the only way by which they can be made to give an assured navigable capacity is by canalization; that is, the creation of a series of slack-water pools by the erection of dams, and through which dams the boats ascend or descend via locks.

Canalization costs are heavy. Comparatively few rivers promise enough traffic in advance of improvement—and there is the crucial point—in advance of improvement to warrant the necessary expenditure.

The reports of the War Department to Congress concerning the advisability of improving this or that waterway wind up with an expression like this:

"Assured navigable depths on this river can not be secured except by canalization, which can not at present be recommended because the cost will be gerater than the now apparent benefit."

The United States has expended for the canalization of 3,667 miles of river about $132,400,000—equivalent to $36,000 a mile. Much of the mileage is on streams of low slope, where a low dam will create a slack-water pool for a long distance upstream. The average cost of United States Government work on streams of high slope—streams having water-power sites—is $193,000 a mile.

There are in the United States at least 4,325 miles of river channels included in present existing navigation projects, or over which the Federal Government retains jurisdiction for navigation purposes, on which water-power developments could be made, having a total capacity of at least 10,200,000 horsepower.

Then Mr. Leighton goes on to speak of the details of the cost of canalization, on page 498.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I will.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Of the total horsepower capacity of 10,200,000, can the gentleman tell the committee how much has thus far been developed?

Mr. SIMS. That is just what I am going to do.

Now, the Engineer officers of the War Department know whereof they speak concerning the canalization of navigable streams at private expense. I am going to give you briefly some of the results.

We are coming to the point of these river improvements by private capital, about which Mr. Leighton further says:

The total length of waterways canalized and used at private expense under the direction of the War Department for through navigation purposes is 108 miles. These 108 miles of waterways cost the Government $214,720—equal to a per mile cost of $2,000 or thereabout. Contrast this with Government expenditure per mile, unaided by private capital, of $193,000. What cost was sustained by private capital we do not know. We know that it could not have been less than $40,000,000, and it has resulted in the development of 251,800 horsepower, which is being used by the public in furtherance of economic needs and social well-being.

One hundred and eight miles, Mr. Leighton says, has been improved by private capital at a cost that could not be less than $40,000,000. If we divide this sum by the number of miles, we find that these 108 miles of rivers thus improved by private capital—and, by the way, Mr. Leighton says the cost for these rivers is the prewar cost—makes an average cost of those 108 miles of canalization of $372,000 per mile by adding $2,000 per mile provided by the Government, 6 per cent interest on which will be $19,320 per annum per mile.

The total cost at this rate of canalizing 4,325 miles of river would be $1,708,900,000 at prewar cost of labor and material. Now remember that this $372,000 a mile for that which has been canalized by private capital is for the navigation improvement only; that is, for the dams and the locks and those necessary structures for operating a navigation dam. There is not a dollar included in that estimate for the erection of the water-power plant that furnishes the water power for the purpose of operating the electric-power plant called the generating plant. When you add to the $372,000 a mile the cost of the water-power machinery to operate the generating plant, and then add the cost of transmission lines over which the current reaches its destination, and then add the cost to it of the transformer stations which must be at each end of the line, and then add the cost of the distribution plant at the point of consumption, it presents a cost per mile of canalized river that is stupendous, and it seems to me to be almost beyond the possibility of private-capital undertaking to do anything of that sort for a limited period of 50 years and with the power of Government—municipal, State, and National—to prescribe the rates to be charged for current.

So it seems from the best evidence that I can get that the cost of improving navigable rivers simply for navigation purposes supplemented by the additional cost of the water-power plants, the generating plants, the transmission lines, transformer stations, and the distribution plants will be so great as to be prohibitive, except as to isolated parts of some of the rivers where a large and good market already exists and where the cost would run far below the average. High-power transmission lines would cost $14,000 to $15,000 per mile. So I see no prospects of immediate development by private capital growing out of canalized navigation projects, unless the power to be created by the improvement is so tremendous, so great, and so profitable that these stupendous capital expenditures can be made with reasonable hope of a fair return on the investment, which projects must necessarily be few indeed.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. There has been a good deal of effort and energy on the part of Congress in the past year to prevent private capital, however, from going into these streams and constructing dams for future development of water power, has there not?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think so. I do not remember the instances.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. There are a number of instances.

Mr. SIMS. I do not recall them.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The Long Sault and the Coosa River I remember particularly.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman is perhaps more familiar with them as projects than I am, as he is on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Congress otherwise would say nothing at all, which I do not commend; and Congress has said nothing at all. There is no sort of doubt that private enterprise can go and develop this water power to a tremendous expense.

Mr. SIMS. In spots.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Of course, it is located in spots.

Mr. SIMS. I am coming to the discussion of a proposition which seems to me very essential to be considered. Is it necessary in the public interest to canalize these 4,325 miles of rivers for commercial purposes? Is it necessary to canalize all these miles of rivers in the public interest? If it is necessary in the public interest to improve the navigation of these 4,325 miles of rivers, which is a small portion of the 18,500 miles as a whole, if it is necessary—and I do not say it is not, because engineers like the gentleman of whom I have just read from say it will be in the public interest to improve all these miles for navigation—then, ought not they to be improved as a single project? Ought not all this mileage be improved if we are doing it for the benefit of the whole public, for the benefit of the Nation, and not for some particular spot or locality or some particular corporation or individual? If it is intended to benefit the whole country, if it is desirable that the whole 4,325 miles be canalized, I can not see how it can be done as a whole in any other way than by a corporation that is backed by the Government of the United States or by the Government of the United States itself. There is no doubt that many of the water powers that will arise by the building of navigation dams will be developed by private capital. Yet it is just as necessary to improve streams where it is not possible to have profitable water power incident to the navigation dams; in all such projects private capital will not be interested. Now, whatever is necessary to be done in the improving of navigation and the upbuilding of the country the Government ought to do, just as it has in the case of low-running streams, like the Mississippi, whether it is profitable or not. Nine hundred millions of dollars have been spent by the Government in the improvement of navigable rivers; six hundred million dollars of it have been spent on nontidal streams, where no profitable water powers grew out of the expenditure. Was it not a proper and wise expenditure?

Now, if it is in the public interest for the Government of the United States to develop this whole 18,400 miles of navigable rivers, shall the public interest fail to be served simply because private capital will not undertake it as a whole? We know that it never will be done by private capital as a whole, because it can not be made sufficiently profitable to private capital to induce it to invest in this stupendous project and take the chances incident to it.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The gentleman certainly would not improve those parts of streams where there is no demand for power and it could not be utilized?

Mr. SIMS. Nor would private corporations do it.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Why should the Government improve for water-power purposes where private capital can do it?

Mr. SIMS. The Government does not do it for water-power purposes.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Navigation is the real object?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly. That is the real object. Here is one of the highest authorities in the United States who says that there are 4,325 miles that can not be improved except by canalization, from which would come 10,200,000 horsepower. All the men who have come before our committee, with a few exceptions among the engineering and development class, are what I call project men, and in almost every instance there is a development somewhere locally in which they are interested. I do not mean a financial or personal interest, but their section is interested in it; and what weighs with them is the development in their own locality, and they are usually in favor of whatever it takes to secure the development in which they are interested, and they are opposed to any legislation that will not secure it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I wanted to know whether or not it was the purpose of this bill to improve under the power of improving navigation when, in fact, it will be used as a design to put in the electric power? In other words, will it give power, under the guise of improving for navigation purposes, to produce electric power where it is not needed?

Mr. SIMS. I was just coming to that. It is a very pertinent question. There is not a particle of doubt about it.

Mr. SNOOK. I wanted to get at the gentleman's argument. I do not know whether I understand it correctly or not, but I think I do. Is it the effect of the gentleman's argument then, if this bill is passed, he thinks it will not be practical for private enterprise to improve any of these items for hydroelectric power, but it will all be done under the provision allowing the Government to do it?

Mr. SIMS. No; I do not.

Mr. SNOOK. I thought that was the effect of your argument.

Mr. SIMS. No. I have not come to that part of it.

If we are to determine at this time that these 4,325 miles must be improved—I am answering the question of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SNOOK] now—I say if we are going to undertake to require directly or indirectly the improvement and canalization of the whole 4,325 miles at any particular time, that nothing less than the Government, or a corporation backed by the Government, can do it. But there are projects in the 4,325 miles that will improve the navigation of the particular stream at a particular place that will also furnish a water power that will justify private investments. Now, our bill provides for such projects. It provides that it may be done, because the Government, to the extent that an improvement in this way is made, will be relieved of paying out the money in advance for 50 years. But under the provisions of this bill this improvement is all made at ultimate Government expense. Every bill that we have ever passed provides that when the Government recaptures or desires to take over this improvement at the end of the licensed period it must pay, according to the different bills, the actual fair value, not exceeding the original cost. In this bill it is the net investment, not exceeding the original cost, so that it is the Government that must ultimately pay the original expense. But you will get by private capital some improvement in advance of the whole improvement of the 4,325 miles much earlier than if you waited for Congress to authorize the improvement and make the appropriations necessary to do it.

Mr. SNOOK. Does the gentleman think that if the commission that is to carry this bill into effect concludes that the gentleman's argument is right and that the navigation must be improved as one part of the whole system, would they go to work and give to private parties the right to build a project here and there in the system?

Mr. SIMS. I have no doubt of it. But the Government has the right and power at any time to take it over by paying just compensation.

Mr. SNOOK. Do you think private capital would do that?

Mr. SIMS. I think so. Ultimately it is all at Government expense, because any project that will be improved at the present time, or within any reasonable distance from the present time, will have to be such as will appear to the engineers as an exceedingly good project. I am just as anxious to have it done as anybody. But, as I say, when you look at this thing there is an ultimate matter to be considered. It is all potential Government ownership and Government expense, so far as the building and installation of any property that the Government may ultimately take over is concerned. There is no doubt about it.

But the bill provides for every method of improvement, because the power is needed, and needed badly. Therefore we give the power in section 7, specifying in what instances the commission shall refuse all applicants and report to Congress that it is the opinion of the commission that the Government should make the improvement. I have no doubt that the Government of the United States ought to own and operate every part of the water-power development at Niagara Falls on the American side. I am in favor of the Government taking it over and paying a fair value or paying just compensation for it, because it is so much needed and so necessary for the Government at this time that I would not higgle anything about the net investment or anything of that sort, so far as that particular project is concerned. It would be cheap at almost any price to the Government and to the community.

One of the chief reasons and objects for the development of these hydroelectric powers is the manufacture of atmospheric nitrogen, so valuable to agriculture, so necessary to our agricultural development. Now, take a great project like that of Muscle Shoals, on the Tennessee River, in north Alabama, which the Government is now improving. The Government can improve a water power and develop it to manufacture atmospheric nitrogen and sell it to the farmers at the cost of production, and it ought to be done. I do not hesitate to say so. And it ought to retain it forever. But it may, of course, lease the power afterwards to some private manufacturer. But when the Government owns every dollar of the investment it can supervise, oversee, and regulate the price to be charged.

Now look at the possibilities in case of private corporative improvement. In the first place, one corporation may be organized to put in a dam and build the water-power machinery necessary to operate the electric-power plant. That would be one corporation. Then that corporation can sell to or make a contract with the generating plant. The generating plant may be owned by another corporation. It buys the water power from the water-power company, and then the transmission company, another corporation, owns the transmission lines, and buys its current from the generating corporation. The distribution company, at the end of the line, can be another corporation, and buy its current from the company that transmits the electric power. Each one can be a separate corporation; each one can have overhead charges, and the power of the commission to regulate the price of the water power to the generator would cut no figure with the ultimate consumer, so that the power to control in the interest of the consumer must go all the way from the water-power company down to the final consumer. The danger is that if we do not withhold that right to these corporations to combine that in the end the consumer will pay the prices that can be obtained by such manipulations as are usually resorted to in such instances.

Mr. SNOOK. Going back to the question the gentleman referred to a moment ago about the power at Niagara, a few days ago we passed, did we not, a bill extending the right of the corporation to use that water? At the end of that time would the Government have the right to take over the plant at Niagara under this bill?

Mr. SIMS. They are not acting under this bill. I think their time has expired.

Mr. SNOOK. Under this bill—is there power in this bill to give the Government the right to take over the plant?

Mr. SIMS. I doubt it. Congress can give the power, and I think it ought to be done immediately. I think we ought not to hesitate a moment about it.

Now we come to another phase, and I do not wish to take much time on that. We have provided in this bill that where water powers are created or produced by navigation dams constructed wholly at Government expense the Government shall have the right periodically to adjust the compensation at the end of each 10-year period.

One of the questions that must necessarily arise in the consideration of these water-power measures is the question of a charge for the right to use the water to generate power. This was carried in the bill first proposed at a minimum of not less than 10 cents per horsepower per annum. The committee amended the bill and left it to the discretion of the commission as to what it should charge and how it should be charged. Personally I believe it ought to be based upon a percentage on gross receipts. I so contended before the committee, and the committee adopted that principle, and then afterwards reconsidered its action and struck out everything except the naked power to make a charge. The charge upon gross receipts is exceedingly fair, because by it you impose no charge upon unused power. You only take a part of that which the company itself receives for its product. It is a favorite method of taxation of public-service corporations. In California, where they have a great deal of electric power generated, some on public lands and some not on public lands, the tax charged by the State against the hydroelectric power companies is, I think, between 5 and 6 per cent of the gross receipts. It is stated in the hearings, and I will put the exact figures in the RECORD. That is in lieu of all other taxes. The highest amount received by the California hydroelectric companies is about $64 or $65 per horsepower per annum, and the tax is something more than $3 per horsepower per annum. Yet they are going right ahead and doing business, and doing it well.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That is on the horsepower developed.

Mr. SIMS. On the horsepower which they dispose of and for which they receive pay. Therefore it is absolutely fair. It is not a charge on the horsepower capacity, but upon the receipts realized from the product sold.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. As I recall, the water-power companies of California practically monopolize the water-power possibilities of the State, and in order to prevent complications among themselves they have developed only a very small fraction of the possible water power of the State. They pay taxes on that which they develop, and the rest of it which belongs to them, but which they do not care to develop, lies idle and produces no revenue at all.

Mr. SIMS. I am unable to say whether the facts stated by the gentleman are correct or not, because I have not looked into them. No doubt they are correct, because the gentleman does not make guessed-at statements.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAUGEN. The other day the gentleman referred to the statement of Sir Adam Beck as to the rate charged; that on the American side was twice as high as the rate on the Canadian side.

Mr. SIMS. At wholesale.

Mr. HAUGEN. The rate on the Canadian side being $18 per horsepower——

Mr. SIMS. That is for the retail or ultimate consumer's price.

Mr. HAUGEN. No matter whether wholesale or retail, $18 per horsepower on the Canadian side and $36 per horsepower on this side. According to Sir Adam Beck's statement an excess charge of at least $18 per horsepower is being charged on this side. Does the gentleman think that 10 cents per horsepower is a sufficient compensation to the Government for the use of the water power?

Mr. SIMS. It is no compensation at all, and was not claimed to be compensation. Mr. Merrill, who came before the committee and made a statement at great length, is the chief engineer of the Bureau of Forestry in the Department of Agriculture. He said the only object of the charge was to pay expenses of administration.

Mr. HAUGEN. In that respect I differ with Mr. Merrill.

Mr. SIMS. I mean that is what Mr. Merrill said.

Mr. HAUGEN. Under this bill, according to the estimate, 60,000,000 horsepower may be developed, and if the licensees may be permitted to make an excess charge of $15 or $20 per horsepower per annum, there would be an annual rake-off of about $1,000,000,000. Does the gentleman think that in these times we ought to part with these valuable resources to be exploited by certain gentlemen, many of them so-called high financiers, and permit them to charge over a billion dollars a year in excess of a reasonable charge?

Mr. SIMS. Taking the facts as stated by the gentleman, his position is absolutely correct; but you can not produce——

Mr. HAUGEN. I suggest that if I am right, it should be written into the bill, and if a charge of 10 cents per horsepower is provided in the bill——

Mr. SIMS. It is not so provided in the bill as reported. The right to fix the charge is given to the commission.

Mr. HAUGEN. But in the bill prepared by the Secretaries that was the charge fixed, and I submit that would be an absurd charge.

Mr. SIMS. That was the minimum charge.

Mr. HAUGEN. And in order that the committee might not appear ridiculous it struck out the 10 cents and left it to the commission to fix the rate to be charged.

Mr. FERRIS. It would be fair to say that that was the minimum.

Mr. SIMS. That was the minimum. The commission may fix a charge of $10 per horsepower if they want to do so.

Mr. HAUGEN. The gentleman also stated that the charge was only to cover expenses of administration.

Mr. FERRIS. I understand. The gentleman from Iowa and I are in accord about that.

Mr. SIMS. That was merely Mr. Merrill's statement before the committee as to the objects and purposes of the charge as he regarded it. He was just one man. You will remember that I cross-questioned him and asked him why all this vast opportunity to make money should be given over to individuals, with no opportunity for the Government to recoup itself in any way whatever for more than the naked expenses of administration.

Mr. SNELL. I am very much interested in the question asked a few minutes ago, if there was any doubt in the gentleman's mind as to whether there was power to take over existing projects. As I understand the bill, there can be no possible doubt that there is no power in the bill to take over projects now in existence—for instance, at Niagara Falls.

Mr. SIMS. I mean as to those that may hereafter come into existence under the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the gentleman to answer that he doubted whether there was that power. Is there any question about it, that the bill does not confer that power?

Mr. SIMS. I do not remember the act of Congress under which these grants were made to those power companies at Niagara Falls.

Mr. SNELL. There is nothing in this bill that provides it?

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. SNELL. Absolutely nothing?

Mr. SIMS. No; except at the end of the license period, or unless revoked for cause.

Mr. SNELL. That would not apply to existing projects.

Mr. SIMS. No; because they are not licensed. The bill itself provides that they shall in no way be affected by this law, but it does provide that the projects established under other laws may come in and get a license under this bill, and, of course, afterwards they would be subject to the provisions of the bill.

Mr. SNELL. But the gentleman's answer was that there was nothing of the kind in the bill——

Mr. SIMS. No; because Congress can provide the power to do that at any time when it is in the interest of the Government.

Mr. SNOOK. How will it be when the present law expires?

Mr. SNELL. That is a temporary matter, anyway.

Mr. SNOOK. Will they not have to get their license when the year is up?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; but there is no obligation after this year to give them the power.

Mr. SNOOK. Why can not they come in under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. SIMS. They can.

Mr. SNELL. There is nothing that obligates the Government beyond the 12 months.

Mr. SIMS. No. Now, let me go on as to this matter of the charge. As a matter of course, the charge ought not to be a flat charge on all projects alike. Why? It may be necessary in thinly settled portions of the West to develop a water power for the purpose of increasing the population—the building up of the country, just like we built the railroads through unsettled country. There could not be any profit to the railroad immediately, but there can be a water power developed, hydroelectric power, where it will have a tendency to build up towns and communities. Such a project as that ought not to be charged the same per horsepower as a going concern that has its market already created and is already in existence and is making large profits.

Now, suppose the minimum tax charged by the Government of the United States should not be less than 1 per cent upon the gross receipts. One per cent would be so small as not to prevent the development anywhere, and a percentage charged is an honest, fair, square, nondiscriminating charge, because if they do not make it they do not have to pay it. If they do not have receipts, they do not pay anything.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the chairman intend to go into the bill section by section and deal with the recapture provision?

Mr. SIMS. I do not expect to go into it section by section at this time.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is dealing with the charge; and is the gentleman going to deal with the regulatory features of the bill?

Mr. SIMS. No; I do not intend to do so to-day.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman intend to deal with the recapture provision to-day?

Mr. SIMS. Only with reference to the charge.

Mr. FERRIS. But the charge is not the recapture provision.

Mr. SIMS. No.

Mr. FERRIS. The recapture provision is more properly the damages that we may pay after the retaking.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say to the gentleman from Oklahoma that I am expecting not only his valuable aid, but I am expecting him to take charge of the recapture provisions in the bill, because I heartily approve of his position in regard to that matter.

Mr. FERRIS. I thank the gentleman. I have not given the time to it that the gentleman from Tennessee has, and I hoped that he would deal with it.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has given the water-power question so much study that he does not have to give much time to know more about it than almost anyone else.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a further question.

Mr. SIMS. I will yield.

Mr. SNELL. Why do you select out the water power over any other manufacturing industry?

Mr. SIMS. Because the charge is a Government charge.

Mr. SNELL. Why should the Government select the water power any more than any other industry?

Mr. SIMS. I am coming to that. The recapture provision in this bill and all other bills that I know anything about have provided that at the end of the license period the Government of the United States might take over the property, or such portions of it as it saw fit, by paying a fair value for the same, not to exceed the original cost, and excluding all such elements of value as franchise, value, good will, and going-concern value, the enhanced value of real estate owned by the company that grew out of the fact that it had received a license from the Government.

Recapture is a term which simply means the right of repurchase. I do not know why it was called recapture; it seems to me to refer to something like capturing a man who has just escaped from the penitentiary and was afterwards caught by the officers of the law. It may be that they thought that it would be about as hard to get this property back as it was to catch a criminal who escaped from prison.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact that capture would be better?

Mr. SIMS. No; I would say repurchase.

Mr. SNELL. It is something that somebody has made or manufactured, and the Government has captured it.

Mr. SIMS. I do not care to go into the net investment provisions of the bill, which I do not think ought to be in the bill, but the committee has adopted that plan as to recapture, and the gentleman from Oklahoma will discuss it more clearly than I can; but I want to say, as I said before—and I am going against the theory of the bill I am representing—that the recapture provision in any of these bills is impracticable and will never be exercised. Why? If Congress was not in the way, if the commission had a right to do this thing and did not have to put it up to Congress in order to secure an appropriation for it, there would be no trouble about it, not a bit.

But when you provide that Congress has got to make an appropriation at the end of 50 years to pay for the then existing property, unless it has been completely amortized by operation profits, it will not do it, and we know it will not do it. Congress will simply say, "Lease it out again"; some other corporation might get a little better terms, but on the theory of just simply collecting enough to pay administration expenses, it would not have any inducement to amortize. Amortization ought to take place automatically through operation, and if it does not take place in that way, I am afraid recapture will never take place, because Congress will have to make the appropriation and Congress would be very slow to put the Government of the United States into competition with privately owned water powers that it had licensed, which terms had not yet expired.

Mr. FERRIS. And the very fact that the gentleman states makes it the more our duty to observe carefully just what is written into the recapture clause, as to whether it is made more or less onerous of retaking.

Mr. SIMS. Undoubtedly so.

Mr. FERRIS. And the only thing that changes the grant from one in perpetuity to a grant or lease for a term is our ability to get it back.

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely.

Mr. FERRIS. And if we fail in our effort to get back or allow sentences and provisions ponderous and cumbersome to creep into the retaking clause, does it not also itself, from the very ponderous nature of the working of Congress, become a grant in perpetuity?

Mr. SIMS. In practice and effect it will result that way. The provisions are such that they will not be availed of, and Congress will have to determine that matter by appropriation at that time just as it will in the beginning.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Upon the matter of recapture, on the other hand, opposing what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] says, if you make the recapture too easy, do you not make the terms to those who would invest their capital in these water powers so onerous and unattractive that we should go along, under this bill, as we have been going without any development at all? What we want, as it seems to me, is to put in terms that will insure our having these water powers developed.

Mr. SIMS. By private capital.

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield so that I may reply to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. In reply to the gentleman from Connecticut, under the existing law the water powers in the West are developed under what is known as a revocable-permit law.

Mr. TILSON. But are they developed?

Mr. FERRIS. Let me proceed a minute. That law permits the Government, with or without notice, with or without payment, with or without process, with or without a recapture clause, to go in and cut them off any time, and they actually do it, and that law is too harsh.

Mr. TILSON. It certainly is too harsh to get results.

Mr. FERRIS. Under the navigable-stream law, and under the laws we proceed under, Congress reserves to itself the right to do that same thing in a navigable stream. This bill, and with my full approval, lengthens that out to a term not to exceed 50 years, makes it definite and certain how long the term shall be, makes it definite and certain how much they shall pay, makes it definite and certain what regulation they are subject to. To go beyond that in order to get capital to make investment is taking a very long step, it seems to me, and a safer plan would be to give them fair regulation, give them a 50-year term, give them a proper recapture clause, give them a reasonable rate, and then, which is very much more liberal than they now have, if no operation is secured it would then be time enough to come in and amend the law rather than to lock the stable after the horse is gone. That is the way it appeals to me after five or six years of study of the subject.

Mr. TILSON. It seems to me after 8 or 10 years watching these water-power bills, watching the potential water powers that are not developed, seeing all the great waste of power through all of these years, while we are running short of coal, that our concern ought to be to some extent to pass a law under which we can develop water powers. We should so construct the bill as to encourage development and thereby utilize and conserve the power that is running to waste, instead of being so very much afraid that we may give somebody a chance to make 30 cents.

Mr. FERRIS. That is simply the difference between those who have and those who have not. The gentleman would have the Government give away what it has to the end that somebody else may take advantage of it. The gentleman would have a man of wealth give away his wealth to the end that no poor might surround him, and so on such logic proceeds. I am unwilling to give away even in war times the greatest of our natural resources in order to make it easy for a few men to go in and borrow money on a proposition without any capital at all and make it possible for them to make millions from it.

Mr. TILSON. The trouble is that we do not seem to have anything now under which we can get anybody to develop the water powers.

Mr. FERRIS. We have given them no adequate law whereby they can have a chance to do it.

Mr. TILSON. Absolutely correct; and I hope we shall give them that law in the passage of this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I, too; but I am not willing to take it all away from the Government at one bite of the cherry.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Assume that we adopt a recapture clause which will not assure a return of the investment at the end of 50 years.

Does not the gentleman think that the adoption of such a recapture clause would be the strongest possible argument made before the board fixing rates in favor of a rate for the power high enough to fully insure those making the investment? As a matter of fact, is not this true, that every dollar you attempt to put in jeopardy in an investment of this kind is a dollar that will be continuously capitalized and held by the user every day in the 50 years, so that in the effort to do something for the people you are really penalizing them. That is the evil of that kind of a recapture clause that does not guarantee the return of the capital. Is it not inevitably so?

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has both asked and answered the question, and that is better than I can do.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will permit me further, the House has four times passed on the sufficiency and the adequacy of a recapture clause, has it not?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. Twice on bills coming from the gentleman's committee and twice on bills coming from the Committee on Public Lands, of which I am a member. At any time has the Federal Government in any one of those bills or clauses agreed to become the absolute insurer of its grantee or lessee or licensee in doing one of two things, going on forever or having every penny of money returned him? Have we ever agreed to such a thing?

Mr. SIMS. The bills speak for themselves. We do not, if I understand the provisions of this bill; and I know when the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce brought in a bill which seemed to squint in that direction the House took charge of it——

Mr. FERRIS. There is no dividing line here between the two parties——

Mr. SIMS. Not at all.

Mr. FERRIS. Men on that side and men on this side anxious to do their duty have stood for a correct provision to enable us to get the water power back at the end of the term. If 50 years is not enough, we ought to make it longer; and if it is too long we ought to make it shorter, but so that when the term is ended we shall be able to get it back, and get it back without question. And I think there can be but one answer to that to men who want to do their duty here.

Mr. SIMS. I am not now speaking as the chairman of the committee or representing the committee in what I said as to the recapture clause as a thing that could not be effected, but that it could not be made operative, not that the Congress could not do it, but it will not do it, and what is practically impossible might just as well be a physical impossibility, because it never takes place. Now, I have myself, in a crude way, a suggestion to make, which, I think, will automatically amortize the property, and instead of the Government having to bring a suit, instead of the Government having to have a long process of accounting to see what unamortized portion of the property remains to be paid for at the end of the licensed period, that the property will of itself revert automatically to the Government. That is exactly what we want to take place.

Now, this bill is to secure development. Of course, if we cut off all possibility of some speculative profits, private capital will not go into it, and I am glad to know that we are able to take care of our Government and its national necessities even if no private investment banker ever loans it a dollar. It should not be a bill to permit men who have, to make more out of what they have, without any additional sweat of their brows. The love of unearned money is the root of all evil. The object of many is to get money without earning it; to make the bill attractive to those who have money, make the bill attractive to idle capital. This is no time to talk of idle capital or making attractive provisions for it, when every man, woman, and child to-day is making exertions to his physical capacity in order to keep this country from failing in its defense and support of free institutions.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Does the gentleman think his plan would be feasible under a bill which gives the State utilities commission in each State the right to fix the charges?

Mr. SIMS. I would not say anything of that kind.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is what the bill does.

Mr. SIMS. I would not turn over Federal functions and Federal provisions of law to be administered by State agency unless in so doing it becomes a Federal agency.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I beg your pardon; this bill does that very thing. We turn over rate making to the State commission if it has one, and if any State has not then our commission takes care of it until it does have one, and then it is turned over to them.

Mr. SIMS. This bill goes far enough now as it is now reported, and it is nothing new in this bill that violates the Federal provision of that sort. This bill provides that if a State has a commission that then there is no authority to be exercised by this Federal commission.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We could not very well fix such an amortization clause in here and make it absolute when the property would have to be turned over at a certain time, and the various State commissions fix the rate of charges during the license period.

Mr. SIMS. I have not yet presented my views on the subject.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let us have them.

Mr. SIMS. I said I wanted it thoroughly understood I am not representing the committee or any member of it except myself in my amortization suggestions.

Mr. HAUGEN. But the Federal commission has the first say as to the fixing of the rates.

Mr. SIMS. You can put it in the license——

Mr. HAUGEN. Under the bill the Federal commission fixes the rate to begin with, and after that the State commission fixes it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. They fix the charge, and in fixing the rate leave it to the utilities commission of the States.

Mr. SIMS. They fix the Federal charge, and then——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. You are going to make a general charge for amortization in addition to the rate fixed by State commissions——

Mr. SIMS. Let me make my statement. I do not have a particle of doubt about its clearness, and then the gentleman can say as to whether or not it is a wise thing to do.

But if we will make the charge a percentage upon the gross receipts, and then place the amount collected in the United States Treasury to the credit of the project, to the credit of the company, and whenever the collection that is made from the particular project in the Treasury of the United States, with interest on it, equals the then existing value of the project or the property, deducting from the elements of value just what has been deducted in every bill we have passed and is deducted in this bill, then and at that time the title to all property in the licensee shall vest in the United States Government upon paying this fund over to the licensee. Thus we have an automatic amortization, and by putting that provision in the license it will be valid and workable. Whenever the fund thus derived, treated as an amortization fund, equals the value of the property and the same is paid to the licensee, automatically the title to the property vests in the United States Government, and then the owner becomes a trespasser if he refuses to give possession. Then, without congressional appropriation, the Government of the United States gets its own property and can do with it as it pleases—operate it or lease it out, or do anything it desires to do with it. This can be done regardless of State regulation, because it is a part of the license and constitutes the consideration for issuing of the license, and thus becomes a substantial part of the contract, which is to constitute an amortization fund, and whenever it equals the then existing value of the property it is to be paid to the licensee in full of all his right, title, claim, and interest to and in the property at that time, just as they have been in all the bills here. You have got real amortization. Then the property is in the hands of the Government, to do just as the law then existing may authorize to be done.

Mr. FERRIS. But does not the gentleman realize a little objection to that course in this, that that would require the present generation to pay for the water power?

Mr. SIMS. No; I do not.

Mr. FERRIS. That would be true, would it not?

Mr. SIMS. They pay a little more, but the amortization charge for 50 years is so small that it would be imperceptible.

Mr. FERRIS. But whatever it was they would pay?

Mr. SIMS. The consumer would not get it anyway. As I said in my opening address—I do not remember whether the gentleman was present or not——

Mr. FERRIS. I did not hear him all the way through.

Mr. SIMS. But as I said then, it is an absolute fact that you can not regulate the price of any particular project with reference to a fair earning upon that particular project unless it furnishes all the power within its distribution area. If it does not produce it, if you put the electric power down where it would be only a fair earning on the capital invested, you would prevent the coal or the steam power from being utilized at all.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman will indulge me a little further, of course the gentleman's statement is not without precedent. Some governments do the very thing the gentleman advocates. But suppose you were in a State like Montana or Utah, or any other State, and there was a water power already in private ownership, then to set up a Government power by its side and charge a royalty to the Government, and secondly, an amortization fee and amortize it, would it not be impossible for the publicly-owned project to succeeed?

Mr. SIMS. It would have a tendency to do that very thing. That is undoubtedly true. But, as I said, about one-half of our power is of that kind. Then I cited the State of California. The tax in California on the gross receipts is 5.6 per cent per annum on the gross receipts, and the average was sixty and some odd dollars per horsepower per annum, which made more than $3 per horsepower per annum. Now, if California wanted to do the best thing it could ever do for its people, whenever that tax, treated as an amortization fund, equaled the value of that property, would be to have the Government take over the property and operate at cost in the public interest.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. In a moment.

Gentlemen will remember that Sir Adam Beck testified, and it is in the hearings, that in 25 years a project at 1.8 per cent per annum on the investment was completely and perfectly amortized, and that some of the municipalities reduced their capital so rapidly that they had to reduce the price of the current to the consumer to keep them from amortizing in 7 or 8 or 10 years.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman's theory is more advanced in that than any of the bills that have been brought into the House, but I am afraid it would carry a burden on the property every year that would retard its early development.

One would be a foolish person if he did not hope we could soon have the power as our own, and paid for, and amortized, and without any entangling alliances with private owners; but taking the gentleman's view, which is an advanced one, and taking the provisions of this bill, or rather, the amendment to this bill, which provides the Government with the alternatives either to let the power go forever or to pay back every cent that went into the investment, had not we better go back to the provision we had in the original administration bill, and say, in the event of retaking we shall pay the fair value of the property and no more, which, in any case, shall be no more than the net investment? In that event you will have preserved all the virtue there is in the net investment and the amortization feature and at the same time you will not require from the Government or the community that seeks the right to recover the property to pay more than it is actually worth. For example, at the end of the term it is up to the Government, or the city, or the State, or the county to pay for the property. Immediately the question arises, What are you going to pay for the property? Under this recapture clause written into this bill as it now stands one of two things only can be done: You must pay back every cent paid in, whether the machinery is worn out or not. But under a fair valuation provision in the original bill all you would have to do would be to pay back what the property was actually worth, not exceeding the original cost or the net investment, and if the chairman can get the House or the committee to go with him at all, it would be well to say the actual cost, and not in any event to exceed the original net investment. Then it would be safe for the community and for the Government. This would be fair all around. This would be exactly what we did in previous Congresses.

Mr. SNELL. Did Sir Adam Beck, the head of the Hydroelectric Commission of Canada, show in his testimony what towns in Canada were successful under Government ownership?

Mr. SIMS. Yes. They are pointed out in detail.

Mr. SNELL. From the reports of the commission that I looked over carefully I could not find the towns.

Mr. SIMS. The towns keep on coming in under it. They have not increased their price at all, although their expenses are greater than they were before.

Mr. SNELL. They are getting their prices during the war?

Mr. SIMS. Under the hydroelectric commission in Canada, which has to furnish current at cost to the consumer, it is so attractive and so desirable that every town is getting in it just as fast as possible.

Mr. SNELL. But they did not put in the charge of $250,000 that the Government puts in every year.

Mr. SIMS. I do not care. They are giving it to the consumers without profit.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fancied less expense rather than a real less expense if all the costs are not actually put in?

Mr. SIMS. Undoubtedly. But the assumption of the gentleman from New York is not correct.

Mr. SNELL. I would like to have it proven.

Mr. SIMS. Because it shows that the entire expense was over $2,000,000 less than before, and the towns that get their current from the commission have vastly increased their use of it.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that very well; but there were a lot of expenses in the first few years to the Toronto people.

Mr. SIMS. I am glad if that is so. If the Government was liberal enough to pay a lot of initial expenses, that was a good thing.

Mr. SNELL. But it all ought to be put in.

Mr. SIMS. If the purchaser who pays the bill is delighted with it and the price is less than ever before, the purchaser does not care about that.

Mr. FERRIS. The investment bankers or bond brokers, as they were called—did they compare this bill with the Shields bill for the recapture?

Mr. SIMS. One of them did.

Mr. FERRIS. What was his reply?

Mr. SIMS. He said this was infinitely better, from the investment standpoint, than was the Senate bill.

Now, some gentlemen seem to get the idea that this is what I propose. I do not propose to levy a charge or tax and then an additional tax as an amortization fund. Let the Government of the United States get absolutely nothing—just become a trustee for the project owner and collect from him a charge based upon gross receipts. Put it as anything you please. It is a compulsory, automatic amortization, and no State or municipality could possibly ignore it or invalidate it by reason of providing rates that would be confiscatory. That would constitute no charge at all on the part of the Government.

What is the theory in this bill? It is that the Government is really borrowing money for 50 years for the purpose of putting in these projects, and instead of paying interest is letting the lender make what he can out of the project, subject, of course, to regulation. That is all of it, and the Government's property ought to go back to the Government without a great deal of ciphering and without any ejectment suits. The Congress never will, in my judgment, 50 years from now make an appropriation to pay for the property in order to take it over for the Government. I do not think it will ever pay a dollar to repurchase, but in the meantime the Government can charge only a reasonable charge upon gross receipts. It has kept that fund. In one instance it would be amortized in 20 or 30 years, where the commission, knowing there were large profits, could charge a higher rate, and where it was to build a power plant in a thinly-settled country it would charge the minimum. But whatever the charge, let it go to the credit of the owner in the Treasury of the United States, and whenever the charge, with the interest accumulated on it, equals the value of the property at any particular time, then the property becomes the property of the United States without any conditions whatever, except that the payments made in this way by the United States shall equal the fair value at the time and the fair value be limited by the various restrictions that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] mentions, and which have heretofore been carried in every bill. Then we do not swindle anybody, and it will not hurt private investors.

I want to call your attention particularly to the fact that not a single private manufacturer of current in the Province of Ontario has gone out of business or gone into the hands of a receiver or has become bankrupt since the establishment of Government ownership of hydroelectric power in that Province.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the chairman of the committee this question: Of course we have been very much interested in the elucidation of his theory with reference to finally taking over all these plants by the Government. I want to ask the gentleman if it is his purpose to press in the committee this provision under the five-minute rule?

Mr. SIMS. I have not offered an amendment. I did not offer it in the Committee on Water Power, and when I said what I did I spoke simply as an individual and stated that I was not representing the committee and not attempting to represent it. I know we all want to do that which is best for the country and that which will not prevent development.

I am going to read to you what the attorney of the Montana Power Co. said with reference to the recapture provisions in this bill. The gentleman was Mr. Kelley, the ablest lawyer who appeared before us, in my judgment. Let me read to you what he said on the question of the recapture provision in this bill and of the absolute necessity for any good concern to amortize its plant. Under this bill as now reported there will be no inducement to amortize. In fact, there is an inducement not to do so; I mean to provide an amortization fund—that is, to make a reasonable charge and to take a part of it and lay it aside—which will lessen the final amount to be paid upon recapture of the property. They will never do it. They will be foolish to do it. They will want just as big an unamortized and unappreciated property as they could have when the Government takes it over. I will read to you what Mr. Kelley, of New York, says on this subject, and then I am going to yield the floor. Mr. Kelley, almost in the beginning of his statement, on page 291, says this:

As I pointed out this morning, the essential proposition upon which the whole financial fabric of this bill rests is the element of fair return, because these various funds are only credited back against the original cost, when they are accumulated out of earnings in excess of a fair return. With the question of fair return undetermined, as it must of necessity be in the initial stages of the enterprise, the licensee is confronted with the probable situation—at least the possible situation—of working to the end of the license period and then finding that by judicial definition of "fair return" his entire property account upon which he expected to realize upon its being taken over by the Government has been completely obliterated and wiped out.

Now, why, gentlemen, should there be in this particular class of legislation any necessity for inserting these ambiguous and restrictive provisions that burden us and that are troublesome?

He is speaking of the Merrill bill, the amended bill—

What is there peculiar to water-power enterprises, as distinguished from any ordinary enterprise, that makes it essential to distinguish and define with absolute particularity in advance—50 years in advance—of a possible situation calling for its application, a rule unsupported by judicial decision and without interpretation to inform as to its meaning?

That is what Mr. Kelley, one of the ablest lawyers, says as to this provision.

Again, on page 296, Mr. Kelley says:

Section 15 contains the provisions which deal with the situation at the termination of the original license. Now, in the first place, it is a matter that it is needless to argue from the standpoint of the water-power developers, that they believe that the original licensee should have the preference right to the license, unless the Government exercises the right of recapture.

The CHAIRMAN. You mean by that if he is willing to take them on as favorable terms as anybody else?

Mr. KELLEY. Exactly. But there are two things I want to call to your attention. In the first place, if this bill becomes a law in the form in which it is drafted through the exercise of the authority given the Government under section 10, before the expiration of 50 years the original cost will have been completely amortized. There will be no capital investment required from the subsequent licensee. That is all right, perhaps, so far as the Government is concerned, if the licensee has been permitted to make a fair return on his money, but the capital investment may have been completely amortized. It has been wiped out. Now, I do not believe that it is just; I do not believe that it is right; and I do not believe that it is consistent with the spirit of our institutions to permit John Smith to step into the business of John Jones merely because a commission may have the legal authority to divest Smith and invest Jones. The idea undoubtedly prevails that under section 15 the subsequent licensee would have to invest a very considerable amount of money to take over a project. That might not be the case at all. The project may have been completely amortized. In such case there would be no net investment. It would be simply a question of business succession; therefore it seems to me that upon a basis of fair legislative policy, unless for cause shown some disqualifying reason exists, the original licensee should have the preference so far as subsequent licenses are concerned, unless the Government or a municipality wishes to take over the project.

The gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. STEPHENS] asked him a question, and Mr. Kelley answered:

If you pass section 10 as it is drafted here, just as it is outlined in this bill, and if the project makes any financial success at all, the probabilities are that there will be nothing left at the end of the 50 years that will go into original costs, because with no definite subsequent term provided for—and that introduces another question as to the successive license—provision will probably have to be made for completely amortizing the principal of the investment within the 50-year period.

The answer of the administration—speaking of it now as the proponent of this bill—will be that such is not the case, for this reason: That the bill provides that either at the end of the original license period or of any subsequent license period compensation must be made. But that provision of the bill also contains this provision: That while the terms of the original license are known definitely and settled in advance, the terms of the subsequent license at the expiration of the 50 years shall be governed by the law and by the rules that are then in existence. These might give a year-to-year license a mere tenancy at will or other indefinite tenure. No investor looking to the security of the investment is going to advance money with the possibility confronting him that the subsequent license will be one at will, indeterminate in character, from year to year, or under conditions that can not now be foretold. And therefore insistence will be made for the complete amortization of the money invested within the 50-year period. Now, that answers the question as to whether or not there will be any original cost left to figure in the recapture provisions.

Then on page 298:

The CHAIRMAN. Will not the Government own it absolutely then, in case of complete amortization?

You will notice he has said it will be completely amortized if section 10 is complied with. He answers:

In the case of complete amortization, I take it, all the Government would have to do would be to serve notice and take it over.

Now, you see that Mr. Kelley, who is the attorney of the Montana Water Power Co., says that under the bill, if the law is carried out, that it will completely amortize the property before the 50 years, and not a word is said about putting an excessive rate on the consumers. He is the attorney of the largest water power developed in the United States. He says it is absolutely necessary to do so, and he says it is wrong to put an inducement in there that is in there, to keep the operator of the property from keeping it up and maintaining it to its full efficiency, to prevent him from setting aside an amortization fund, a depreciation fund, and so forth, because he says that the very fact that you will have what is left unamortized will prevent amortization, whereas he says good business experience demands that it shall be and will be amortized during the period. Under my plan it becomes a Government-owned project, to be disposed of as the Congress may at that time determine. But taking a navigation project which costs $193,000 per mile to canalize the river and to that add the cost of building the water-power plant, the electric-power plant, the transmission lines, the distribution plant, which will now cost $2 for every $1 that it would cost in normal times, when could it ever amortize? The commission ought to charge more per annum for a large-paying project than it would a weak, little, struggling power plant that is trying to develop some western community.

Let us compare this with the railroad situation. Some railroads, upon a fair, nondiscriminative rate, make 20, 25, or 30 per cent per annum upon their capital. Other railroads, weak and struggling, do exceedingly well if they make 4 or 5 per cent on their investment. Yet both railroads are under the same commission, operated under the same law, both getting the same reasonable rates. It was shown in the debate on the railroad-control bill that some railroads were making as much as 25 per cent per annum net. Now, suppose that the strong roads had to take care of the weak roads and make up the deficits of the weak, as will be done now, you could reduce the general charge and bankrupt no road. But the trouble about it is that the commission in fixing reasonable rates has got to make a rate that the weak roads can live on, and when a rate is made that the weak road can live on the strong road grows fat and rich and prosperous upon it. It will be just that way with water powers. A charge that would absolutely bankrupt a financially weak water-power company would not hurt or injure a water-power company more fortunately situated, and the complete amortization therefore should not take place at any particular stated time but only when the reasonable charge made by the commission, treated as an amortization fund, equals the value of the property.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Is it the gentleman's understanding that under this bill the commission will fix one rate applicable everywhere?

Mr. SIMS. According to this bill if a State has no commission, no public-service commission, the commission provided in this bill will fix the rates.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. But it does not say the same rate everywhere.

Mr. SIMS. Oh, no.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The illustration that the gentleman gave with reference to the railroads had one rate.

Mr. SIMS. No; not the same rate; it is a reasonable rate, and a reasonable rate is not confiscatory.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman has any doubt about the amortization proposition, why does he not put in the bill a just compensation?

Mr. SIMS. There is no amortization about that. The just compensation is all right if you limit it.

Mr. SNELL. Is it limited?

Mr. SIMS. You can put anything you want into a license because it is not compulsory. If we were going to take over the plant, we would have to pay a reasonable compensation.

Mr. SNELL. A just compensation.

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Then, why not put it in the bill?

Mr. SIMS. For the reason that we are granting a license without which no right to build the dam and structures exists in order that they may make money, and why should we not put in such terms and conditions as may be in the public interest?

Mr. SNELL. Is it not for the interest of the people at large to have these water powers developed?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Then it is not altogether a private matter, is it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that the provision of the Constitution that a just compensation shall be paid for private property for public use does not apply here at all. Here are water powers belonging to the people that we are undertaking to license to people to use under proper governmental regulations, and it is for Congress to prescribe the regulations. If they do not accede to the regulations, they do not have to build plants or operate them. The provision of the Constitution that I have referred to does not apply here, for they do not have any property in the water power and can not acquire any.

Mr. SNELL. At the end of 50 years they would have an interest in it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. That is true; but they must acquire it under the provisions and regulations prescribed by Congress.

Mr. SNELL. Is there any value in the water power undeveloped and running to waste?

Mr. FERRIS. There certainly is, enough so that the water-power companies under the license make it a basis for a loan, and all through the life of that franchise they put it in as they did in Washington and Oregon, at a value of ten or twelve million dollars as a basis for fixing the rate that they would charge the people, when the land cost them only about $1.25 an acre.

Mr. SNELL. But there is no real value at all in the water power until it is developed.

Mr. FERRIS. It is of very great value. It is the thing about which nothing can go forward, one that can not be dispensed with either in the initial or the close. So the gentleman can not say that the great falling water has no value. It has value more than anything else; like all other resources it loses nothing in the use because it is neither consumed, used up, nor gone.

Mr. SNELL. It is of no use, of on value, until developed. What value are you getting out of it to-day in its undeveloped state?

Mr. FERRIS. The money in the gentleman's pocket is of no value until he takes it out to spend it, but he does not want to give license to the highwayman to rob him of it.

Mr. DEWALT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. DEWALT. As I understand the provisions of the bill, after a somewhat cursory reading thereof, it gives the commission the power to locate the project upon the stream. That being so, how does section 23 comport with that idea? Section 23 says:

That the provisions of this act shall not be construed as revoking any permit or valid existing right of way heretofore granted, or as revoking any authority heretofore given pursuant to law, but any person, association, corporation, State, or municipality, holding or possessing such permit, right of way, or authority may retain the same subject to the conditions set forth in the grant thereof and subject to any and all rules and regulations applicable thereto and existing at the date of the approval of this act, or may apply for a license hereunder, and upon such application the commission may issue to any such applicant a license in accordance with the provisions of this act, and in such case the provisions of this act shall apply to such applicant as a licensee hereunder.

Now, query, and I want the chairman's construction of this section. Suppose that on the banks of the Delaware River there is now existing a power plant which has been in existence under a charter which was granted by the State of Pennsylvania. As I understand this section, these rights as granted by the State of Pennsylvania are not interfered with by this act. Is that so?

Mr. SIMS. Not unless they were in violation of existing law. Unless it is an obstruction to a navigable stream.

Mr. DEWALT. I take it as a premise that the corporation exercises the right along the navigable stream which it has obtained by the State charter, having inalienable rights that are not interfered with by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SIMS. No; as far as the provisions of the bill are concerned they are not interfered with. The bill does not interfere with them.

Mr. DEWALT. If that is so, how would the act providing for utilization of water power along the stretch of the Delaware River, where there would be, possibly, and are a great many utility corporations using the water power, operate? How would the Government, using its privileges by license, supersede the powers given by the State to an existing corporation having prior rights on the stream? How does the gentleman think this section comports with that provision?

Mr. SIMS. The bill provides that existing powers may come in and seek a license under the bill. If it should be permitted, it would be subject to the provisions of this bill but not before.

Mr. DEWALT. That is a disjunctive. That gives existing corporations the right, but it does not say that they must do so. It does not come under the provisions of this section. I recur to the provision. For example, here are Mr. DEWALT and his associates by charter given the right to use the water power for utility purposes, the generation of power for hydroelectric transfer, or whatever it may be.

Now, FERRIS and his associates are determined to proceed under the provisions of this act, and they apply to the United States Government commission, created by this act, for a license. The United States Government desires to give them that license to use that power on the Delaware River. Here are 50 people or 50 corporations along the Delaware who have the present existing rights. How do you make this section comport with the inalienable rights given by the State of Pennsylvania to these chartered corporations? In other words, does not the act become a nullity under such conditions?

Mr. SIMS. It does not apply to them, as I understand it, at all. It does not apply to any existing water-power development that has been developed according to the laws under which it is chartered, either Federal or State, unless it does something that will be a violation of laws outside of and beyond this bill. This bill gives nobody any right to do that which would be unlawful if the bill were not passed.

Mr. DEWALT. In other words, you take the position, as chairman of the committee, that existing rights granted by charter by any State are not interfered with by the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely; but I would not say that this confirms any rights they have, provided the rights they assume are not according to existing law.

Mr. DEWALT. Now, another query. Section 27 provides:

SEC. 27. That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect or in any way to interfere with the laws of the respective States relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses, or any vested right acquired therein.

As I construe that it appears to me to mean this: That the "vested right" acquired "therein" applies to a vested right in the control of water, in the appropriation of water, in the use of water, or in the distribution of water used. How? Used in irrigation or for municipal or other uses. In the State of Pennsylvania, and no doubt in a great many other States, we have what are known as riparian rights. The man who owns the land along the banks of a stream has the right to the use of the water undiminished in quantity by the owner above, except in so far as the owner above may use the water for culinary and household purposes, including the watering of his stock, and if the owner above uses the water he must return the water to the stream in undiminished quantities, except in so far as I have stated, so that the lower riparian owner has the water in undiminished flow for any lawful purpose he may exercise. That is what is known as a vested right; it is a right that runs with the land. Therefore I inquire of the chairman, does this provision in section 27 reserve and preserve the riparian rights of owners of the land along the banks of streams? If it means that, then I would like the affirmance of the committee in saying so, and if it does not, I would like to know what it does mean.

Mr. SIMS. I want to say that there is no portion of the bill that is intended to conflict with any rights to which the gentleman refers. Let me read. Section 23 provides:

SEC. 23. That the provisions of this act shall not be construed as revoking any permit or valid existing right of way heretofore granted, or as revoking any authority heretofore given pursuant to law, but any person, association, corporation, State, or municipality holding or possessing such permit, right of way, or authority may retain the same, subject to the conditions set forth in the grant thereof and subject to any and all rules and regulations applicable thereto and existing at the date of the approval of this act, or may apply for a license hereunder, and upon such application the commission may issue to any such applicant a license in accordance with the provisions of this act, and in such case the provisions of this act shall apply to such applicant as a licensee hereunder.

Mr. DEWALT. But that has no reference to section 27.

Mr. SIMS. It shows the spirit and purpose of the act is not to interfere with existing rights.

Mr. DEWALT. Section 27 applies to something entirely different.

Mr. SIMS. I think I know what the committee intended to mean it to apply to, and I would be willing to state what it is.

Mr. DEWALT. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. SIMS. A number of power plants have been developed under laws heretofore passed, and there have been water powers developed under the revocable permit. This section provides that those powers should not be interfered with or conditions added to them unless they voluntarily come in.

Mr. DEWALT. No; that is section 23; I am talking about section 27. Section 27 provides that nothing therein contained shall be construed as affecting or intending to affect, or in any way to interfere with the laws of the respective States relating to the control, appropriation, use, or distribution of water used in irrigation or for municipal or other purposes, or any vested right acquired therein. As I before stated, in reference to lands in Pennsylvania in regard to the riparian rights, a man who has land along a stream, whether it be a navigable stream or a nonnavigable stream, has the right to the use of that water for the watering of his lands, and the owner above can not take that water except for the purposes I have stated. If he does, he must return it to the stream in undimished quantity. That is the law. That is a vested right. You speak here of vested rights. Does this bill contemplate that for irrigation purposes of that character those rights are preserved when you use the phrases "vested rights" and "used in irrigation."

Mr. SIMS. It seems to me the section is as plain as it can be written in its application. Of course that is a matter of construction. It is intended not to affect the laws of the States regarding these rights.

Mr. DEWALT. If that be the construction, then how does it become possible, under the provisions of this act to give an effective license to any corporation or any set of men who desire to use these waters?

Mr. SIMS. If it would interfere with these rights?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. It could not be done.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; but I am trying to get through.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will not the bill be workable in this way? These rights that the gentleman speaks of, the riparian rights, might be condemned by the licensee who would secure the flowage rights in that way.

Mr. DEWALT. I did not catch the gentleman's remark.

Mr. SINNOTT. I say the licensee under this bill would have the right to condemn these riparian rights of which the gentleman spoke and secure the flowage rights in that way.

Mr. DEWALT. He would, but the bill provides the condemnation shall take place in a forum to be selected by the grantee of the license, and that forum shall be either the district court or the court of the State in which the land is located, and it does seem to me that that is one of the things that does not protect the State's rights nor the rights of the individual who has land in the State.

Mr. SINNOTT. That is the fact; you might go into the Federal court?

Mr. DEWALT. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I do not like that feature of the bill myself.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I have gone over this matter in a more or less desultory way, and of course have responded to all interruptions because I thought I ought to do so and I thought, perhaps, it might shorten the length of time to be consumed if I should give answers satisfactory to the inquirer. It is getting late in the afternoon, and there is quite a number of other important subjects embraced in the bill which I know will be well taken care of by other members of the committee, and therefore I shall not proceed to discuss the bill in its details any further, but I do want to appeal to the Members of the House, and I am appealing now to the Members who are not in sight, to attend the meetings of the committee and let us give this bill due and proper consideration and pass it as soon as we can consistent with such due and proper consideration.

When we get into the amendment stage under the five-minute rule many things can be explained in connection with any amendment that may be offered to its provisions which would take up a great deal of time to do in general debate. All I wanted to do was to try to explain the general features of the bill as well as I could, and what I said about my own scheme of amortization was only a suggestion. I do not expect to insist on that at all. I am representing the committee rather than my own individual views. I heartily indorse the position taken by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] with reference to the recapture provision in connection with this bill. I know what we all want to do, and that is we want to do the best for the entire country. There is nobody here who is working for any special interest or desires to do so. As I said before, this bill provides potentially and to a great extent practically for development and to secure the greatest amount of development as early as possible. I do not know—I have seen something in the newspapers to the effect that a recess was being discussed. I do not know just how soon it is to be proposed, or anything about it; but inasmuch as we have begun the consideration of this bill, and inasmuch as it affects so many States in a local way and the whole United States in general, I do hope that we may remain here until we pass the bill in the House, because, as we are amending a Senate bill, just as soon as it goes to the Senate, if the Senate sees proper and does not refer it to the committee, it can disagree to the House amendments and ask for a conference; and then a conference can take place during the recess if we have any recess. But I do not think the idea of a recess with the temperature in Washington so low that we have to wear fall overcoats or be very uncomfortable—I do not think we ought to have a recess until we finish this bill, and I do not believe anybody expects to do so, and I hope the recess talk will not interfere with the consideration of this bill. I hope we will all be here to-morrow, although it is Saturday, when you will hear some gentlemen on this subject who will be very interesting and enlightening to you. With these few words I close my somewhat lengthy and desultory speech and shall yield the floor to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH].

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield before he does that? The gentleman's suggestion of appealing to the Members of the House who are not here—does the gentleman think they should be here?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know why they are away; they may have reasons for being away that to them are imperative.

Mr. WALSH. Then, I make the point of no quorum——

Mr. SIMS. I did not mean to suggest that I wanted the gentleman to do anything of that sort. What I meant to say was that I did not want this talk of a temporary recess during the session of the House to get the recess fever so completely and perfectly that they would be willing to take a long recess. I hope there will be no other talk of a legislative——

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman does not care to have the point of no quorum made, it seems to me that he ought to be willing to rise now. He has occupied the floor with a very interesting and well-prepared speech; and if there are not going to be gentlemen here to listen to the other speeches——

Mr. SIMS. Let me say in that connection I see the point the gentleman makes. Now, if the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH], who has charge of one-half of the time, does not care to occupy the floor himself this afternoon, I have no objection, not the slightest, as I do not want to put the gentleman from Wisconsin in the position of beginning his argument at a time when perhaps he will have very few Members present.

Mr. ESCH. I did not intend to make any remarks this afternoon, but I had promised one or two Members on this side time for the balance of the afternoon.

Mr. SIMS. If there is somebody on that side to use the time, as a matter of course I would be very glad for the gentleman to use it.

Mr. WALSH. At what time does the gentleman expect to move to rise?

Mr. SIMS. As Mr. ESCH will be in charge of the time on that side, I should want to consult with him about it. I will move to rise in time and——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the gentleman's statement, I will withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, in view of the condition which must be evident to everyone, I move that the committee do now rise—Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw that motion and ask for a roll call.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill S. 1419, the water-power bill, and finding itself without a quorum, he had ordered the roll to be called, that 195 Members had answered to their names, and that he therewith presented a list of the absentees for printing in the Journal and the RECORD.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ESCH] is recognized.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what the President's message is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman of the committee has no right to state what it is, even if he knew. But he does not know. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] will proceed.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WEBB, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 1419) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of dams across navigable waters," approved June 21, 1906, as amended by the act approved June 23, 1910, and to provide for the improvement and development of waterways for the uses of interstate and foreign commerce, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CONFERENCE REPORT—CHARTER RATES, ETC.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the conference report on the bill H. R. 12099, for printing under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on H. R. 12099, to confer on the President powers to prescribe charter rates and freight rates, and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The report is ordered printed under the rules.

VETO MESSAGE—AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL (H. DOC. NO. 1229).

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I regret to return without my signature so important a measure as H. R. 9054, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," but I feel constrained to do so because of my very earnest dissent, from the point of view of principle as well as of wise expediency, from the provision of that part of section 14 which prescribes a uniform minimum price for No. 2 northern spring wheat of $2.40 per bushel.

I dissent upon principle, because I believe that such inelastic legislative price provisions are insusceptible of being administered in a way that will be advantageous either to the producer or to the consumer, establishing, as they do, arbitrary levels which are quite independent of the normal market conditions, and because I believe that the present method of regulation by conference with all concerned has resulted in the most satisfactory manner, considering the complexity and variety of the subject matter dealt with.

It is evident that the present method of determining the price to be paid for wheat has had the most stimulating effect upon production, the estimated crop of spring wheat for this year exceeding all high records in a very remarkable and gratifying way. By an overwhelming majority of the farmers of the United States the price administratively fixed has been regarded as fair and liberal, and objections to it have come only from those sections of the country where, unfortunately, it has in recent years proved impossible to rely upon climatic conditions to produce a full crop of wheat, and where, therefore, many disappointments to the farmer have proved to be unavoidable.

Personally I do not believe that the farmers of the country depend upon the stimulation of price to do their utmost to serve the Nation and the world at this time of crisis by exerting themselves to an extraordinary degree to produce the largest and best crops possible. Their patriotic spirit in this matter has been worthy of all praise and has shown them playing a most admirable and gratifying part in the full mobilization of the resources of the country. To a very greatly increased production of wheat they have added an increased production of almost every other important grain, so that our granaries are likely to overflow, and the anxiety of the nations arrayed against Germany with regard to their food supplies has been relieved.

The administrative method of agreeing upon a fair price has this very great advantage which any element of rigidity would in large part destroy, namely, the advantage of flexibility, of rendering possible at every stage and in the view of every change of experience a readjustment which will be fair alike to producer and consumer.

A fixed minimum price of $2.40 per bushel would, it is estimated, add $2 per barrel to the price of flour; in other words, raise the price of flour from the present price of $10.50 at the mill to $12.50 at the mill, and inasmuch as we are anticipating a crop of approximately 900,000,000 bushels of wheat this increase would be equivalent to the immense sum of $387,000,000.

Such an increase of the price of wheat in the United States would force a corresponding increase in the price of Canadian wheat. The allied Governments would, of course, be obliged to make all of their purchases at the increased figure, and the whole scale of their financial operations in this country, in which the Government of the United States is directly assisting, would be thereby correspondingly enlarged. The increase would also add very materially to the cost of living, and there would inevitably ensue an increase in the wages paid in practically every industry in the country. These added financial and economic difficulties, affecting practically the whole world, can not, I assume, have been in contemplation by the Congress in passing this legislation.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
12 July, 1918.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the veto message be laid before the House for consideration. I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House agree, upon a reconsideration, to pass the Agricultural appropriation bill the objections of the President of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. LEVER. Upon that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. You do not have to do it. The Constitution enforces it.

Mr. MONDELL rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Wyoming rise?

Mr. MONDELL. To make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-seven gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will make this suggestion, if the gentleman will permit: The Constitution requires the calling of the roll.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. That was the thought that I had in mind and suggested to the gentleman in discussing the matter of making the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee moves a call of the House.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to make a request to have this matter come up to-morrow? Nothing now evidently——

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There being no quorum present, nothing can be done except a call of the House or adjournment.

Mr. HAUGEN. Then I move, Mr. Speaker, that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Upon a call of the House now will the vote be had upon this?

The SPEAKER. It would not. Nothing is before the House. There is no quorum present.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that it is my desire that this vote might come immediately upon the main proposition, but if a gentleman saw fit to make the point of no quorum and the point of no quorum is sustained, then there would be nothing to do but a call of the House and to make a proposition after that.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WALSH. Assuming that the demand for a call of the House is withdrawn and a roll call is had upon the veto message and the roll call develops no quorum, will it not be necessary, in case the House should adjourn, to take another vote upon the veto?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But the point of no quorum is determined, and therefore there is only one of two things to do—to have a call of the House or to have the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is entirely correct. The gentleman from Tennessee moves a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, what becomes of my motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER. The Chair never heard the gentleman make that motion.

Mr. HAUGEN. I made a motion to adjourn, and I insist on that motion.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman made the motion to adjourn, a motion to adjourn is in order. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the motion was rejected.

The SPEAKER. A call of the House is ordered. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The answer is "present" or "here."

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 209 gentlemen have answered to their names, not a quorum.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, July 13, 1918, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of War submitting a deficiency estimate of appropriation required by the Ordnance Department of the Army for submarine mines and appliances, Panama Canal, for the fiscal year 1918 (H. Doc. No. 1221); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, together with report of Col. George A. Zinn, Corps of Engineers, with map on a preliminary examination of main ship channel in or near the mouth of Columbia River on the southerly or Oregon side from a point in the vicinity of Point Adams to a point a short distance above Tongues Point (H. Doc. No. 1222); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

3. A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting original papers relating to the claim of Sylvester Lane, as alleged helpless child of Reuben Lane, late of Troop B, Fourteenth Pennsylvania Cavalry (H. Doc. No. 1223); to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

RATIFICATION OF CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to state to the Senate that he has received, addressed to the Vice President, a communication from the governor of the State of Georgia, inclosing a certificate of the ratification by the legislature of that State of the proposed prohibition amendment to the Constitution. The communication will be placed on the files of the Senate.

TELEGRAPH CONTROL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair also has a telegram from the organization of Western Union telegraphers now in session in Chicago, being a protest addressed to the Vice President against the passage of the pending joint resolution, which he will hand to the Secretary for proper disposition.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by G. F. Turner, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed the following bills, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 4194. A bill granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 4543. A bill granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 4722. A bill granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12099) to confer on the President power to prescribe charter rates and freight rates and to requisition vessels, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10852) to provide for the appointment of a commission to standardize screw threads.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 8839. An act for the establishment of Oswego, in the State of New York, as a port of entry for immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise; and

H. R. 12002. An act for the establishment of Bar Harbor, in the State of Maine, as a port of entry and delivery for the immediate transportation without appraisement of dutiable merchandise.

PETITIONS.

Mr. CURTIS (for Mr. LODGE) presented petitions of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, praying for national prohibition as a war measure, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ASHURST presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Arizona State Council of Defense, praying that appropriations be made to recruit labor, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. COLT presented resolutions adopted by the school committee of Providence, R. I., favoring universal military training, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LENROOT presented a petition of sundry citizens of the State of Wisconsin, praying for the submission of a Federal suffrage amendment to the legislatures of the several States, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MYERS presented a petition of the Rotary Club of Anaconda, Mont., praying for a Federal investigation of the present high cost of gasoline, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 4826) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WATSON:

A bill (S. 4827) granting an increase of pension to William F. Craig; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 4828) granting a pension to George W. Hacker (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN:

APPROVAL OF HYDROELECTRIC BONDS.

Mr. JONES of Washington submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 285), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Capital Issues Committee be directed to send to the Senate copies of all papers, communications, and reports on file with it or with its district committee at San Francisco, or any other of its committees or subcommittees or representatives, relating to the application of the city of Seattle, in the State of Washington, for approval of hydroelectric bonds.

NATIONAL GUARD OFFICERS.

Mr. McKELLAR submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 286), which was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, respectfully requested to furnish the Senate the names of all National Guard officers that have been dismissed from the service since the beginning of the present war, by States, together with the rank of each officer and the organization to which he belonged and the dates and causes of dismissal.

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY DANIELS AT NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I ask that the address of the Secretary of the Navy to the graduation class of 1918 at the commencement exercises at the Naval Academy at Annapolis June 6, 1918, be printed as a public document. It is an admirable address.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SWANSON. It is not asked that it go in the RECORD, but to be printed as a public document.

Mr. SMOOT. The rule is that such matters shall be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SWANSON. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed as a public document. Does the Senator object?

Mr. SMOOT. I do. I ask that it go to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under objection, the address will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

STANDARDIZATION OF SCREW THREADS.

Mr. KENYON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10852) to provide for the appointment of a commission to standardize screw threads, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed insert "six months"; and the Senate agree to the same.

WILLIAM S. KENYON,
W. G. HARDING,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
WILLIAM A. ASHBROOK,
E. E. ROBERTS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4194) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. WALSH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House and request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WALSH, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed Mr. WALSH, Mr. THOMAS, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE FALL OF THE BASTILLE—SITUATION IN RUSSIA.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, 129 years ago to-morrow the people of France won their first distinct victory in the fight for freedom. No people had ever been subjected to a more cruel and exacting tyranny, a more soulless and relentless bureaucracy, and no people ever disclosed greater courage or greater capacity for endurance in a great cause than the French people in their struggle for free institutions.

In the young days of our Republic we sympathized deeply with France and felt ourselves very near to the French people as they went forward in the cause of free government. To them we owed a deep sense of gratitude. In the heart of the young Republic of the West dwelt a genuine love for the French people. The common cause of liberty brings us again in closest friendship. It is our hope that this friendship, founded in common respect and common ideals rather than selfish interests resting in contracts, may be enduring. The hour of common danger, of common sacrifice, naturally draws more closely the bonds of affection. But when the war shall have passed and selfish and commercial interests again come to assert their sway, let us bear in mind the underlying ideals and principles of both peoples. They will constitute a safe passport to a friendly and durable understanding.

As a preface to my very brief remarks upon this matter I read a paragraph or two from Mr. Carlyle's description of the fall of the Bastille. It is found in Chapter VI of his History of the French Revolution:

But to the living and struggling a new fourteenth morning dawns. Under all roofs of this distracted city is the nodus of a drama, not untragical, crowding toward solution. The bustlings and preparings, the tremors and menaces, the tears that fell from old eyes! This day, my sons, ye shall quit you like men. By the memory of your fathers' wrongs, by the hope of your children's rights! Tyranny impends in red wrath; help for you is none, if not in your own right hands. This day ye must do or die.

* * * * * * *

Ever wilder swells the tide of men; their infinite hum waxing ever louder into imprecations, perhaps into crackle of stray musketry, which latter on walls 9 feet thick can not do execution. The outer drawbridge has been lowered for Thuriot; new deputation of citizens (it is the third and noisiest of all) penetrates that way into the outer court; soft speeches producing no clearance of these. De Launay gives fire; pulls up his drawbridge. A slight sputter, which has kindled the too combustible chaos, made it a roaring fire chaos, bursts forth insurrection at sight of its own blood (for there were deaths by that sputter of fire) into endless rolling explosions of musketry, distraction, execration; and overhead from the fortress let one great gun, with its grapeshot, go booming to show what we could do. The Bastille is besieged!

On, then, all Frenchmen, that have hearts in your bodies! Roar with all your throats of cartilage and metal ye sons of liberty; stir spasmodically whatsoever of utmost faculty is in you, soul, body, or spirit, for it is the hour! Smite, thou Louis Tournay, cartwright of the Marais, old soldier of the regiment Dauphine; smite at that outer drawbridge chain though the fiery hail whistles round thee! Never over knave or fellow did thy axe strike such a stroke. Down with it, man; down with it to Orcus; let the whole accursed edifice sink thither and tyranny be swallowed up forever! Mounted, some say, on the roof of the guardroom, some "on bayonets stuck into joints of the wall," Louis Tournay smites, brave Aubin Bonnemere (also an old soldier) seconding him; the chain yields, breaks; the huge drawbridge slams down, thundering (avec fracas). Glorious; and yet, alas, it is still but the outworks. The eight grim towers, with their invalide musketry, their paving stones and cannon mouths still soar aloft intact; ditch yawning impassable, stone faced; the inner drawbridge with its back toward us; the Bastille is still to take!

* * * * * * *

How the great Bastille clock ticks (inaudible) in its inner court there at its ease, hour after hour, as if nothing special for it or the world were passing. It tolled one when the firing began, and is now pointing toward five, and still the firing slakes not. Far down in their vaults the seven prisoners hear muffled din as of earthquakes; their turnkeys answer vaguely.

* * * * * * *

For four hours now has the world-bedlam roared; call it the world chimera, blowing fire! The poor invalides have sunk under their battlements, or rise only with reversed muskets; they have made a white flag of napkins, go beating the chamade, or seeming to beat, for one can hear nothing. The very Swiss at the portcullis look weary of firing; disheartened in the fire deluge; a porthole at the drawbridge is opened as by one that would speak. See Huissier Maillard, the shifty man! On his plank, swinging over the abyss of that stone ditch; plank resting on parapet, balanced by weight of patriots, he hovers perilous; such a dove toward such an ark! Deftly though shifty Usher; one man already fell and lies smashed far down there against the masonry! Usher Maillard falls not; deftly, unerring he walks with outspread palm. The Swiss holds a paper through his porthole; the shifty Usher snatches it and returns. Terms of surrender: pardon, immunity to all! Are they accepted? "Foi d'officier, on the word of an officer," answers half-pay Hulin, or half-pay Elie, for men do not agree on it, "they are!" Sinks the drawbridge. Usher Maillard bolting it when down; rushes in the living deluge; the Bastille is fallen! Victoire! La Bastille est prise!

Mr. President, we do well to join in the celebration of the fall of the Bastille. It is not only gracious toward the great nation with whom we are now associated in this struggle for liberty, but it recalls the fact that there were other days in which people suffered and sacrificed in the same great cause. The rumblings of the rocking walls of the Bastille were music to an oppressed people. Its demolition marked the beginning of an era in the history of Europe. Yet while the people felt the inspiration of the event and rejoiced that this somber monument of torture no longer disfigured the earth, many among the wise were in doubt as to its significance. Fox, it will be recalled, was denounced in Parliament and throughout England for giving expression to his great joy. It was one of those events brought about and encompassed by the aroused, undisciplined, and untrained passions of a great nation seeking freedom, but which leaders and philosophers so often misunderstand. How many times in the history of the race have these long-restrained forces broken their leash and in ways no one could foretell or no one could at the time understand wrought mightily for the freedom and advancement of mankind. The course of revolution submits to no rule; it is a law unto itself; it conforms to no plan, not even the plan of its own leaders. There comes a time, it seems, when the great dumb forces of downtrodden and outraged humanity, disowning mercy and disregarding justice, trampling upon every right precept of human conduct and brutalizing all the higher conceptions of life, nevertheless push on and on to a new day, and on and over all confronting obstacles to a higher civilization. In its progress it seems cruel and chaotic, but when we come to look back over it in after years it seems to harmonize after all with some higher law of human progress. Let us take a leaf from this tragic story and gather from it a lesson for our own guidance in this hour of perplexing duties.

There is now in progress among a people who possess one-sixth of the habitable globe, comprising 180,000,000 souls, a revolution superficially unlike, but fundamentally not wholly dissimilar to, the revolution whose first decisive event we now commemorate. We do not seem to comprehend that movement any more than Europe or England comprehended the movement of 1789. We are impatient and critical; but be patient—a nation is being born, an oppressed and long-subjugated people are breaking their chains. We speak of chaos and turmoil and murder and assassination, but maybe these things, too, will round themselves out into an epic of human liberty under some higher law of human progress which we do not yet quite comprehend.

Robespierre had his part to play in the French revolution, and yet from the time we first catch a glimpse of him as a timid country judge until he leaned against the pillars of the assembly and heard his doom from the mob which he had called into being, there is scarcely a redeeming trait to be found in his whole miserable make-up.

Danton, the incarnation of force and passion, also rode the storm for a time, moving like some sinister spirit in the darkness, and still startles us with horror when we contemplate anew his life, and yet the inscrutable forces of progress called him to service also. The whole vast movement which we celebrate, the fall of the Bastille and thereby the 21st of January, 1793, seemed at one time but an exhibition of human depravity and human misery.

Just so in the Russian revolution. There are despicable creatures, corrupted slaves, bold and persistent traitors, but behind all of these are a great noble people struggling to be free, struggling in madness and undiscipline to be rid of that bureaucratic hell in which they have been tortured for centuries. Let us not in our wrath against individuals or isolated incidents lose sight of the great principles involved or lose faith in the great cause going forward or lose interest in the struggle of this great, brave people. Trotsky is an incident. Lenine is of no concern in the final adjustment of things. But the Russian people are of supreme concern and entitled to the sympathy, the counsel, and confidence of free peoples everywhere. They are entitled especially to the help and guidance, the unselfish and beneficent leadership, of this Republic. Let us not stand about as the nations did in 1789 criticizing and anathematizing the French Revolution. Let us have faith in humanity, and the cause of freedom as such, and go in every way possible to the aid of Russia. Let no man nor class of men, no prejudices or passions, come between us and our duty to the Russian people. While we commemorate things which history records and mark anew the milestones of human progress and human liberty, let us take our part in the great events of the present hour. To stand aside while Russia is making this struggle, to offer neither aid nor counsel nor advice, is to fail in what is perhaps the supremest task of this war.

When we seem to doubt the courage or the patriotism or the endurance or the stability of the Russian people we charge ourselves with having short and treacherous memories. Shall we forget the Battle of the Marne, where civilization hung in the balance, and what might have been the result in all probability had not the Russian people held the forces of Hindenburg and Ludendorff upon the eastern front? They did their part in that hour and did it well; for had the entire forces of Germany, under the leadership of these men who then had charge of the eastern division, been able to concentrate with the rest of their fighting forces at the Marne the story of this war might have been different, and the story of civilization might have had a darker turn. Have we forgotten the great Battle of the Four Rivers, under the leadership of the Grand Duke, surpassed by no other conflict of this war for courage and for military ability? Do we forget that they waded through the Carpathian snows, unshod and illy clothed, and fought their way until they looked upon and threatened the plains of Hungary? In the first two years of this war they left 2,000,000 dead upon the fields of battle and 5,000,000 wounded. The Russian people, as a people and as a soldiery, never deserted the cause nor broke down until they were betrayed by their corrupted leaders. Time and time again the brave Russian soldiers stood in line where there was but one gun for three men, and when death came to the armed comrade the gun was seized and thus the battle went on. Do not too readily lose faith in such a people.

We, my friends, find efficient material in the character, the sturdiness, the heroism, and the courage of the mass of the Russian people to constitute the basis of a real free government; and it is both the duty and the obligation of this Government to recognize that fact and to deal with the Russian people upon that basis. Not until there is established in that part of the earth a real, substantial free government will this war be won so as to insure security and stability to this country or a stable and durable peace. If this war should end and Germany should be left in possession of the vast natural resources and man power which she is now taking possession of, we might have peace for a short time, we might have fancied security for a day, but ultimately we would have to face a condition of affairs infinitely worse than the condition which we are now facing.

So, sir, while we are celebrating the event which started the French revolution and helping to revive the memories and the glory of those old heroic days, let us demonstrate our faith in humanity and in the power of freedom by giving of our aid, of our counsel, and of our assistance to the Russian people in their great struggle. I am not finding fault. I am adding a word of encouragement for the plans which I understand are being formed. I am not criticizing, but I am raising my voice in sincerity and candor for a people who, in my humble judgment, contain within them the possibilities of a stable and noble civilization. I have read with concern and no little humiliation the fault-finding and criticism in some parts of this great effort upon the part of these people to be free, and I plead for a higher, firmer faith and a broader vision.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have been greatly impressed, as I always am, by the remarks of the Senator from Idaho, and particularly because of the occasion which has prompted him to speak. I agree that it is our duty, as well as our interest, to take some active part in Russian affairs, to the end that the people and resources of that great country may be saved, as far as it is possible to save them, from Teutonic domination.

There is no question, as the Senator has said, that pan-Germanism has been more potent in the overthrow of Russia than the armed hosts of the Kaiser, and that but for the pan-Germanic influences Russia to-day might be in active hostility, as she was during the first three years of the war, to the Germanic alliance. I wish to remind the Senator, however, that the Russian people and their rulers seem in history to have been the saving force of the Hohenzollerns, without which Prussianism would have disappeared from the earth over a hundred years ago.

The Senator, of course, recalls that Frederick the Great was in his direst and last extremity when opposing the alliance of Austria, France, and Russia, and that only a few days before his inevitable surrender the death of the Empress Elizabeth, followed by the accession of the Czar Peter, changed the whole course of history and saved the Prussian Kingdom from destruction. When the new Czar withdrew from the alliance and placed his forces at the disposal of Frederick, he thus succeeded at a time when, but for such treachery, his race and his people as a nation would have disappeared from history.

Now, it would seem that history has repeated itself, in that the dethronement of the Czar and the accession of the Bolsheviki has again given to the Germanic alliance, in what I believe to have been its second extremity, the opportunity for regeneration and for massing all of its forces against the allies in the west.

I should like to inquire of the Senator whether he thinks there has not been some change in the attitude of the Russian people toward the war, and particularly in view of the collapse of its great army and the absence of what now seems to be any nationally organized government, whether it would be possible for the allies to interfere in a military sense and at the same time act in harmony with the prevailing Russian sentiment regarding the war?

I perceive a great many geographical and physical difficulties in the way of military interference, since the Russian front, if there is such a thing, is many thousand miles away from our nearest sources of supply. I should like, therefore, before the Senator takes his seat to inquire whether the assistance which he thinks we should give to Russia is of a military or of a political character; and whether, in the event the latter is that which he has in mind, we can at present afford any active assistance which, unaccompanied by a display of military power, would enable us to offset the tremendous influence now exercised and extended by the German people over the western portions of Russia?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no doubt, from the evidence I have been able to gather, that there is a tremendous force in Russia among the masses of the Russian people who are not in sympathy with the German cause or with the Prussian idea. In my opinion, there is every reason to believe, especially in view of the action which has been taking place in Siberia and other places for the last 10 days, that there is a powerful force in Russia which would be perfectly willing to cooperate with any power which it believed to have entered Russia with an unselfish purpose and with a desire alone to aid the Russian cause. In my opinion, the Bolsheviki—that is, the forces of Trotsky and Lenine—represent a very small percentage of the real public sentiment of Russia. They have, by reason of conditions which it is not necessary for me to discuss at this time but which the Senator understands as well as I do, and by reason of the aid which was given to them by Germany, been able to dominate the situation to a very large extent. But if the statements that come to us are facts, their power is crumbling, and it is crumbling by reason of the fact that the great mass of the Russian people do not believe that they have proved themselves loyal to the Russian cause. If the United States were to enter upon a program of aid to the Russian people they would find the much larger percentage of the Russian people in harmony with their purposes.

The Senator refers back to the fact in history that there was a betrayal once before of the cause of freedom in favor of the cause of Prussia; but that situation has changed, by reason of the fact that we must deal, if we deal at all, with the Russian people and with any form of government which the Russian people are able to set up, and not with the forces which had control of the situation at the time Frederick the Great was operating in Europe. But, Mr. President, if the Senator is correct in his logic, then I presume the result of it is that we must abandon that great country to the domination of the Germans and to such forces as Germany may select for her work in Russia. If so, the war is already lost.

Mr. THOMAS. No, Mr. President; if the Senator will permit me, I did not intend to leave the impression in his mind that I thought we should do nothing, but, rather, to ascertain from the Senator what our method of procedure should be.

Mr. BORAH. I perhaps did not answer the Senator directly. Of course, I should not want to undertake myself to talk about the details of military movements, because I am not prepared to do so; neither would it be wise to do so if I had obtained the information from those who were wise enough to give it; but I believe we should have both a military and a political force at work in the cause to which I have referred.

Let me say, further, that we find ourselves in the position which we do in Russia by reason of the fact that at the time the revolution happened the allies came to the conclusion at once, apparently, that Russia without their aid could work out her own destiny; and Germany, availing herself of the opportunity which was then presented, went in there with a powerful propaganda and turned the revolution, which should have been against her cause, in favor of it. It was a very great mistake. The allies should have known that these people, subjected to the grinding power of tyranny for centuries, crushing out all initiative and destroying all sense of responsibility, could not step from bondage and serfdom to a stable and manly liberty without making mistakes. It was then that friendly counsel and advice, aid, and support should have been given. Now, I do not wish to discuss details, for here is not the place to formulate them, but I believe in the success of both military and political aid to Russia.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I had the good fortune a few nights ago to listen to the story of a gentleman recently returned from Russia who has spent the last 11 months in that country; and, from his statement of conditions as he perceived them, I rather tended to the conclusion, first, that the Bolsheviki were in power because of an overwhelming peasant and workman sentiment behind them; second, that any military interference which involved an invasion of Russia or an occupation of any part of its soil by the Japanese would present a race question of formidable proportions and in all probability result in a reaction toward Germany because of it; and hence that our method of procedure, for the present, at least, should be confined to peaceful measures, the introduction of American emissaries, and the dissemination of American republican sentiment, which would find a most fruitful field for propagation, and in all probability would accomplish more than could be accomplished in any other way.

This gentleman also directed our attention to the fact that Germany had some time ago ceased military action against Russia and the Russian people, because she had become convinced that she could not by that means acquire that political and economic domination which she desires; that for the last six or eight months she has endeavored by peaceful and commercial penetration to absorb the Russian people, dominate its Government, direct its destiny, and avail herself of the material resources of that wonderful country; and that the allies' best means of overcoming her policy was by organizing a similar widely extended, intelligent, and organized propaganda.

Mr. BORAH. We might or might not differ as to the details, but that we should do something, it seems to me, is apparent.

Mr. THOMAS. Unquestionably.

Mr. BORAH. Permit me to say, however, for fear that I may be misunderstood, that nothing I have said here should be construed into my indorsement of sending Japan into Russia. I am speaking alone of our duties and responsibilities.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I did not so understand. My reference to that subject was due entirely to the views of the gentleman to whom I refer. That gentleman, I may say, is Mr. Raymond Robins, one of the very prominent citizens of Illinois and a man of remarkable ability.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I happen to be somewhat familiar with the information which the Senator from Colorado has from Mr. Raymond Robins. I have heard Mr. Raymond Robins state his views, and think that I know the statement upon which the Senator from Colorado bases his suggestions.

Mr. Robins and other gentlemen who were associated with him in Russia, one of whom is a prominent copper-mining man from Montana, are apologists and defenders of the present Bolsheviki government in Russia. It seems to me that when that statement is made that is enough. The interest of the United States in the Government of Russia, aside from our general humane interest in the welfare of any people, looking at it from a governmental standpoint, is in the part which Russia, with its almost illimitable resources of material and men, shall take in this war. Our interest in the question is, What influence will this great power, unorganized and undeveloped, of men and metals and food, have upon the German Army, which is now attacking with all its force the organized forces of civilization in France?

The gentleman to whom the Senator from Colorado refers makes the astounding proposition that in the face of this crisis on the battle front of France, with the issue of the war—if we are to rely at all upon the information which we get—hanging in the balance, he proposes to divert a part of the man power and of the supplies and resources of this country and send them to Russia, to be used under the control and leadership of the Bolsheviki government. That is the proposition which they make. That is the proposition which, I am very sorry to say, judging from intimations and from circumstances which sometimes have the conclusive effect of proof, has made considerable impression upon the administration.

Why, Mr. President, we have been taught from infancy to condemn and to despise and to contemn Benedict Arnold; but Benedict Arnold's treason and conduct was on a high plane compared with the cotemptible and infamous motives and conduct of Lenine and Trotzky in their betrayal of the Russian people and the allies. There are certain fundamental principles which men of character attach themselves to, and which they follow through the murk and darkness and confusion of the turmoil of the world, regardless of the particular forms and phases which events may take from day to day; and these gentlemen to whom the Senator from Colorado refers would have the United States of America turn its back upon the principles of fair dealing and honesty and faith and loyalty to their country and to their allies and make friends with and give aid and comfort to the traitors who have sold them out! That is the proposition.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I did not hear all of the Senator's statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I saw that the Senator did not hear all of it, but he could have heard all of it if he had listened.

Mr. THOMAS. I am sorry my attention was diverted; but inasmuch as the Senator referred to the Senator from Colorado, may I ask whether the last statement involved a conclusion from something that I said?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The statement speaks for itself. I said——

Mr. THOMAS. I have no doubt of that; and I apologize to the Senator for interrupting him.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I dislike very much to have to repeat.

Mr. THOMAS. I will not ask the Senator to repeat.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will not repeat what I said, but I will say in explanation of it that I characterized in the way I did the policy which is proposed by the gentleman to whom the Senator from Colorado referred as giving him certain information about the matter. That was the substance of what I said.

Mr. THOMAS. I regret that I interrupted the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is not necessary. It is entirely agreeable to me for the Senator to interrupt me. I was just expressing a disinclination to repeat what I had already said.

Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss this question at length. It is a matter which involves a great mass of details and information. There has been considerable curiosity expressed as to how a coterie of traitors and released criminals can maintain themselves against the great mass of loyal Russian people. One of the reasons is that the Russian people are unarmed; that the arms are in the hands of the Bolsheviki and their dupes and the criminals who, though intelligent, for purposes of loot have associated themselves with them. I am informed that even this magnificent body of organized Czecho-Slovaks who have performed the great service for the allies of stopping the flow of food and material from Siberia into Russia, which means into Germany, because Russia, under Lenine and Trotzky—that part of which they are in control—is a mere tributary province of Germany, and every ounce of resources that was available, which was not very much, in the unorganized condition of the country has found its way immediately, as fast as transportation could be afforded for it, into the hands of the German Government,—even the Czecho-Slovoks are largely unarmed. The arms are in the hands of the Bolsheviki. Everybody who thinks about the situation, who has ever faced the realities of life, who undertakes to imagine to himself the situation of a community of unarmed people in the face of a gang of unscrupulous men who have arms in their hands, can understand one of the causes for the predominance of the Bolsheviki and their government in Russia.

Now, these very gentlemen—and if I am mistaken in this the Senator from Colorado may correct me—to whom the Senator from Colorado refers, who have had the opportunity to get information, being connected with the Red Cross in Russia, these very gentlemen who propose for the United States to turn now to the support of and cooperation with these Bolsheviki for the mere reason—and that is the reason that they give—that the Bolsheviki are in power, because the Bolsheviki are in control of the Government, do not deny that the Bolsheviki are friends of Germany.

They do not claim, they do not propose by sending food or a civilian commission from the United States to Russia to cooperate with these unspeakable Bolsheviki leaders, beneath the contempt of decent men of whatever class, government, or party in the world—that they will ever use their influence to organize Russia again to oppose Germany in this war.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment. I started out here expressing the opinion that the interest from a governmental standpoint of the United States in this question is in developing Russia in resistance to the German arms. I take it that is what we are concerned in, at least until this war is won; and these gentlemen who have obtained the ear to a certain extent of people in power in this country do not promise or hope for any prospect in sending our resources to Russia to be used under the Bolsheviki direction, ever to have them used against Germany, to resist the conquering march in which she is now attempting to enslave the world.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator refers to several gentlemen who went on a mission and have come back. One of them, I believe, was Mr. Robins. Does the Senator know what Mr. Robins's political affiliations or views were before he went to Russia?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I can not say. He seems to be a great supporter of the administration now. I think he opposed it in the presidential campaign.

Mr. REED. How many of these men——

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I can answer the question of the Senator from Missouri, if he desires. The political predilections of Raymond Robins were the predilections of many of us in 1912. He was a Progressive at that time, and like the rest of us is proud of the fact that he was then a Progressive. He has been a Progressive since, until 1916, when I believe he supported the Republican candidate for President of the United States; but in politics, generally speaking, Mr. Raymond Robins is wholly independent and represents the highest type of American citizenship.

Now, while I am on my feet, will the Senator from Missouri permit me to correct——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I have the floor, but will yield. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. REED. I should like to finish my inquiry. I want to know how many of these men, if any of them, were Socialists. I did not know that Mr. Robins was a Progressive. I do know that there were one or two Socialists sent to Russia at one time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator from Washington will permit me, Col. Thompson, I am sure, a gentleman of highest repute and multimillionaire as he is, would not be considered a Socialist. Maj. Thacher, a man of ability and culture, a member of a firm of lawyers in New York, conservative in character and practice, I am sure would not be considered a Socialist either. These three gentleman are the ones referred to.

If the Senator from Washington will permit me, while I do not feel at liberty to discuss the Russian situation, I do feel that I understand it from certain standpoints, and I want to correct the Senator from Washington. These gentlemen who have returned are neither the apologists nor the defenders of the Bolsheviki. They have endeavored to paint the picture of Russia as they have seen it, and to paint it so that we may understand it. They are men of different environments, different viewpoints of life, and different spheres of activity, and they agree upon the particular situation, and in agreement and in accord with them, as I understand it, are high representatives of other governments. If I felt at liberty to discuss the situation and point it out to the Senator from Washington, I am very certain I could demonstrate readily the error into which he falls. But the knowledge which has come to me, and come in detail from many sources, I do not feel free at this time to divulge, nor do I think that while an international situation of such transcendent importance is at the very point of determination by the President, I ought to indulge in statements of fact which he has under consideration.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment.

Mr. REED. I am trying to pursue an inquiry.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield in a moment, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I did not bring Mr. Robins's name into the discussion. I desire to say that my impression from hearing the statement of these gentlemen was a very clear impression that they propose, and urge with vehemence, that we should work under the Bolsheviki government in Russia in what we do there.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. By no means.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Then, if the Senator is correct in that, of course, I have a radical misapprehension of their position.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. You have entirely a misapprehension of their position. They endeavored to describe what the Soviet of Russia was. They demonstrated that it was the only government that now exists in Russia, that the Bolsheviki represented a mere party of the Soviet, just exactly as if a political party were in control for a brief period in our Nation. They desired to have an economic cooperation with the Government of Russia in power, whether the power were brifly of one party or another, so that Russia's enormous and tremendous resources should come to the allies and to the United States of America rather than that they should be given to Germany, and they believed they had a rational plan for that particular cooperation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the Senator from California says that these gentlemen whose names have already been mentioned, Mr. Robins and Col. Thompson, of Montana, proposed to work through the Soviet Government of Russia. I make the proposition that the Soviet Government of Russia is under the Bolsheviki, that the Bolsheviki are, as the Senator from California describes them, a party and now in power, as there will be other parties in power and control of the Russian Government. They are acting through the Soviets. The Senator from California says that these gentlemen propose to work through the Soviets, and I say that out of his own statement of the proposition he shows they propose thereby to work under and in harmony with the Bolsheviki in control of that country to-day. They defend that policy. I do not say that they do not ably defend their particular policy, and of course I do not deny their right to do so. I differ with them, that is all. I think there can be no question that that is a proper statement of their position.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator pardon me a moment to make an observation?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. When I made my inquiry I did not know the names of the particular gentlemen over there on the mission except Mr. Robins, whose name I had heard mentioned. I assumed that this was a part of the mission that went over there some time ago. I knew one of those men was Mr. Russell. I always knew that Mr. Russell had been a Socialist. I think there were others who went over there who were Socialists at that time. I understood the Senator was talking about that mission. The Senator from California shakes his head. I hope he does not mean to say that no Socialists have been sent over there.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. If the Senator from Washington will permit me to respond, this was not a mission sent by the Government to Russia. It was a Red Cross organization, that is all.

Mr. REED. I did not understand what you were talking about, that is all.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Col. Thompson was at the head of the Red Cross in Russia, Col. Robins was an executive officer, Maj. Thacher another. Those three did most effective work, and did it during the trying periods since the Russian revolution.

Mr. REED. Now, regardless of who they were, I want to say that it is my opinion that anybody who undertakes to deal with the present Bolsheviki leaders will be betrayed, and thoroughly betrayed, as they have already betrayed their country and the allies.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment, if the Senator please. I noticed this morning in the newspapers, taking it for what it is worth, that one of the leaders of the Government in Russia, for which Mr. Robins, I repeat, is apologist—I do not say he approves of them, but he excuses them, and tries to put a good face upon their present conduct of affairs—one of them was a cigar-store clerk in Philadelphia named Moses Goldstein, who went over to Russia and took the name, by translation or in some other way, of Volodarsky, and was put in charge of the press censorship of the country, and pursuing the principles of the Bolsheviki he suppressed all the opposition newspapers. One of the principles of liberty of this Government of Russia which Mr. Robins thinks may possibly work out substantial and permanent control of affairs is that they will not allow any opposition. If a newspaper opposes them, it is suppressed. Moses Goldstein, the cigar-store clerk of Philadelphia, was so stern in his suppression of opposition newspapers that somebody assassinated him a few days ago. He is rather typical of the other members of the Government of Russia which have gotten temporarily into the control of affairs. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I wish to say I know Mr. Robins. He lives in my city. He has been an active man in all matters looking to municipal purification. While we differ on those abstracts called politics and support different candidates, he is a high-souled, noble-minded Christian gentleman who has given every effort of his life to the alleviation of human suffering and the elevation from his standpoint of government to the heights of honesty and justice. Whatever may have been his errors, if the Senator can see any, I beg him to understand they were errors of judgment, and with such a man would never be intentionally errors of heart.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator did not understand that I was charging Mr. Robins was not a Christian?

Mr. LEWIS. I would have hardly assumed the Senator meant Mr. Robins in his denunciation and I do not see that he could have comprehended a Christian within that definition he gave of the men he referred to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have known good men of high moral ideals long before Mr. Robins's time who were mistaken, and the things the Senator from Illinois referred to seem to me to be rather irrelevant in the settlement of the Russian problem.

Mr. LEWIS. It would, I say——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Just a moment. If a gentleman makes a proposition that a certain policy shall be carried out in Russia, I do not think that the Government of the United States ought to accept it because there is a showing that this gentleman is a Christian and has high moral ideals.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator must not forget it was the Senator from Missouri who asked some information concerning him. I know him as coming from the State and city where I live, and spoke of him in reply to the request of the Senator, as I give information as to the true gentleman he is to anyone interested to know.

If I may be pardoned—I do not propose to hold the floor—I wish to correct one impression the Senator seems to be under. I can not permit the idea to go forth. So far as I have information the administration has not been influenced, as the Senator alleges, nor has this Government now decided upon any course which the Senator seems to feel it is about to embark upon.

I think I can assure the Senator that the present administration and its officials are doing everything in their power to obtain information concerning the condition of Russia and everything in their capacity to enable them to render aid where that aid can be most effective for the benefit of the United States, as well as for the welfare of the Russian people; but up to the present time there has been no decided course settled upon such matter as the eminent Senator seems to think—if I gather correctly from his remarks.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thank the Senator for that statement. It corroborates what I have painfully noticed. I should like by calling attention to what the Senator from Illinois said, knowing his intimate relations with the organization of the Democratic Party, to emphasize before the country his statement, which no doubt is correct on this question, that I believe to be one of the most important in the world to-day or in any era in the experience of mankind. There have been few problems more pregnant with the ill or good of humanity than the settlement of the Russian question as it pends before the world to-day. It has been up for decision for six months, and while day after day with lightning-like rapidity are settling the fate of Russia and the world, the Senator from Illinois, a high member of the party in power now, announces, this 13th day of July, 1918, that the administration has not yet settled upon a policy for Russia.

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, no; the Senator must not misunderstand me or unintentionally misquote me. It is as to the matter to which I referred. I said that I did not believe that any particular policy had been settled upon as the result of conversation with gentlemen such as the Senator referred to upon the particular subject to which he related. I went no further.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The particular subject to which I related was intervention in Russia.

Mr. LEWIS. The Senator brought in a particular question. The principal subject was what relation we would bear to the Bolsheviki or any people connected with them. I understood that was the sole subject up to that time.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is inevitably bound up in what we shall do in Russia in view of the fact that the Bolsheviki are in control of the Russian Government. If the Senator says he did not state that the administration has settled upon a policy, then does he state it has settled upon a policy? Which is the case, one way or the other?

Mr. LEWIS. I would answer, so far as I know, that as the officials of the administration have arrived at no policy as to the particular matter to which the Senator referred, as to the facts concerning the Bolsheviki or what should be done in connection with them, and as to the other policy and as to our aid in Russia, I feel that the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who sits by my side, could speak more authoritatively and should speak.

I for myself say that I think the policy of the Government is to render aid to the Russian people, to aid their democracy, to inspire the sentiment of liberty in them, give every assistance we can consistent with our own welfare in every way we possibly can. But that is a matter which, of course, the Senator will realize I could not enter upon in detail even if I had the details; and not having the exact knowledge, I ought not to speculate on it in this way.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What has the Government done in Russia?

Mr. LEWIS. I think what the Government has done the Senator knows, and what the Senator does not know and is not publicly known it is not regarded prudent at this time to make the revelation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is quite enlightening. I will ask the Senator to be more specific. Has the Government sent any military aid to those loyal Russian people who are fighting for their lives and their liberty against outlaws in Russia?

Mr. LEWIS. I am not conscious of what exact aid is being given or the exact way it is being given. That is only a subject to speculate on, but probably it would be improper for me to indulge in that to any specific degree.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In view of the fact that the Senator is on his feet and speaking of a matter, and has sources of information of such a matter, has the Government sent any civil expedition or economic relief to the suffering Russian people?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I will occupy the time of the Senate but for a moment in reply to the Senator, but I wish to be complete. I have, as the Senator intimates in a complimentary tone, taken some interest in the Russian situation. It has not been a new interest. I traveled over that country twice; and in crossing Siberia I boldly attempted to write some articles of the history of their municipal governments, which they speak of as the "mir." They were not particularly informing; they were not particularly interesting, and I doubt if they would be of any value; but I mention it to show the interest that I have and why I have it on the Russian situation. The articles to which I have referred were sentimental more than political, and are not entitled to or regarded perhaps as of political weight.

Now, in view of those sentiments, I have attempted to impose them upon the officials of the Government, but I have not been successful; they have not agreed that my standpoints, sentimental as they are, were practicable. Therefore, the plans I have had, I will say to the Senator, do not appeal to the practical minds of those who are at present in control of the Government. I am not aware that any delegation, commercial or otherwise, has been sent to Russia, apart from those of which the Senator has complete knowledge and of which the people generally are cognizant.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. NELSON. I have listened to this discussion with some interest, and while I am as anxious to help the Russian people as anyone can be, it seems to me that there is only one practical way to help them, and that is to defeat and to destroy the German Army on the western front. If we can succeed in the war and destroy the German Army, then when we come to negotiate the terms of peace we can say to the German Government: "You must keep your hands off and let the Russian people form their own Government." It is idle to speculate about giving them military assistance at this time. The Black Sea and the Dardanelles are closed. The Baltic is a closed sea. We can not approach the Russians in that way. There are only two ways in which we could possibly reach them; one is by the Pacific Ocean to Vladivostok and the other is around the northern coast of Norway and Sweden, at what is called the Murman coast, up to the harbor of Kola, at the head of the new railroad.

What is the use of dissipating our military strength? We have a few troops in conjunction with the English troops at Kola. They are there on the same principle as the Japanese were at Vladivostok. A large amount of supplies had been sent to Vladivostok and Kola before the collapse of Russia. It was to prevent those military supplies that were shipped from this country, and some from Japan, from falling into the hands of the enemy that those troops were sent there. The Japanese have taken care of the Vladivostok end of it, and prevented the supplies there from falling into the hands of the Germans; and at the other end, up at the Kola Peninsula or the Murman coast, there are British and United States marines, I think; ships of our Navy are there taking care that those supplies shall not fall into the hands of the Germans.

Now, if the Senator from Washington will allow me, the only direct way to help the Russian people is to destroy their enemy, and that enemy must be destroyed on the western front. There is no use of dissipating our resources in any other direction. The moment we succeed in destroying the German Army on the western front, that moment we can help to rebuild Russia, and in no other way.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, so long as Germany has control, as she now has, of the population of Russia, of the man power and the land, with its capacity for the production of food and minerals, we shall not defeat her on the western front. We may drive her back; we may gain successes over her, but she will still maintain the field and still be able to dictate, at least, a portion of the terms of peace.

Mr. President, there is another matter entirely disconnected with the Russian subject to which I wish to refer; but I will add this in reference to what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has said. I agree with him that the only way in which we can aid the Russian people is to defeat the German Army, but that is a good deal like many other social and economic questions which we are discussing here. If we lose this war, we will not have to settle any of them; the Germans will settle them for us. They will settle the status of the Russian people unless they are defeated, and that is why I said a moment ago that the interest which we have in the Russian question is to organize their resistance to German military force.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I am quite in accord with the general position taken by the Senator from Washington; I think that any recognition of the traitors usurping authority in Russia would be hurtful to our cause and to the cause of the allies; but I merely want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that, with the consent of Lenine and Trotzky, Germany has taken possession of Esthonia, has ousted from control the authorities who were elected by the people, has placed Germans in control of the government, has prevented the teaching of the Russian language, has taken over the schools, and only the German language is now taught in the schools of Esthonia, notwithstanding the fact that only 2 per cent of the population are Germans.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There is no doubt about that being in general, if not in particular, the situation in western Russia. Has the Senator from Utah finished?

Mr. KING. If the Senator from Washington will allow me a further observation, if he has not mentioned it, I desire to say that Lenine and Trotzky aided the Germans in getting possession of the fleet in the Black Sea, to use against the allies to aid the Germans in carrying 3,000 troops in two or three days across the Black Sea to use in the operations against the British and other allied forces that are in Asia Minor. Those men are now cooperating with the Germans in every possible way to aid them in the domination of Russia and for the defeat of the allies.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is the reason why I am of the opinion that we are not going to get any assistance from them in fighting Germany. That is what is proposed, however, by some of these Christian gentlemen, with the high moral ideals of which we have heard.

Mr. President, in reference to another matter, I notice in a very conspicuous place on the editorial page of a morning paper of this city this morning this statement:

> Statements of German cruelties attributed by a St. Louis newspaper to an unnamed sergeant of the American Expeditionary Forces sent to the United States to assist in the third liberty loan are denied by Gen. Pershing in a cablegram which has been made public by the War Department. Gen. Pershing recommended that if the sergeant was quoted correctly, he be returned immediately to France for active duty.

I assume from that, if that statement is true, that it means return for active duty in order that he might be punished for telling that the Germans had committed acts of cruelty. This article states that it is put out by the Secretary of War. From what information I have, publicity matter, put out under the name of the Secretary of War, is handled by the Publicity Committee, of which Mr. George Creel is chairman. They quote certain specific acts of cruelty which this sergeant charged the Germans with having committed. He is reported to have said:

> The Germans give poisoned candy to the children to eat and hand grenades for them to play with. They show glee at the children's dying writhings and laugh aloud when the grenades explode. I saw one American boy, about 17 years old, who had been captured by the Germans come back to our trenches. He had cotton in and about his ears. I asked some one what the cotton was for.
> "The Germans cut off his ears and sent him back to tell us they want to fight men," was the answer. They feed Americans tuberculosis germs.

Mr. President, I do not know, of course, whether the particular cases of cruelty that are referred to in this statement quoted from Pershing's sergeant are true. I do not know of my own personal knowledge, of course, so that I could swear to it in a court, that there is any war going on in Europe at all; I do not know even that there is a Continent of Europe, because I have never been there. It is all hearsay so far as I am concerned; the fact that the war is going on is a matter of hearsay and circumstantial evidence, and yet I am convinced that there is a Continent of Europe, that the Germans have an army fighting in France, and that our men, some of whom I have seen in the camps under training, have gone across the Atlantic and are opposed to those Germans. In the same way in which I know those things, I know, Mr. President, that, whether or not the particular acts of cruelty have been committed with which this sergeant is quoted as having charged the Germans and which charges of German cruelty this Government, through the War Department and the Publicity Committee, quoting Gen. Pershing, takes the money of our people and the time of our employees to combat in defense of the German people,—I know that these Germans have been guilty of worse acts of cruelty and of a policy more cruel and inhuman and ruthless than anything charged by Pershing's sergeant for which he is to be sent back to France, presumably for punishment.

Do you believe Brand Whitlock, who was minister of the United States in Brussels when the German hordes overflowed that peaceful, innocent people? Brand Whitlock tells us that the Germans rounded up 96 men, women, and little children, some of them babies in arms, and shot them all down as they stood, until there was not left standing one out of the ninety-odd human beings. We have the stories of eyewitnesses, through Mr. Henry Vandyke, who was the minister of the United States at The Hague, to the mutilation of children, to the killing of old women, to the most unspeakable brutalities which were perpetrated against an innocent, unoffending civilian population, not in individual instances, not by isolated German individual soldiers, but as a German policy and as a practice of the German Army, acting under orders of their commanders.

Why, Mr. President, there are recorded in the permanent books of the literature of the world the instructions of the German Kaiser to his men to pursue a policy such as is described by this sergeant. Their leaders of thought have written into their philosophy in book after book, filling the libraries of the world, the advocacy of a policy of ruthlessness and frightfulness.

Mr. President, does the Secretary of War—and what I am saying I am saying upon the strength of the publication this morning in this newspaper upon the middle of the editorial page, which says that it was put out by the Secretary of War, the leader of the military forces of this country, who comes to the defense of Germany charged with cruelty—does the Secretary of War deny that an unarmed passenger ship named the Lusitania, carrying noncombatants, many of whom were women, and over 50 of whom were little children, was sunk by the Germans without notice and as a part of a deliberate governmental policy of the German Empire, of which their ambassador to this country published a previous notice in the newspapers? Is there anything that this sergeant has said of the acts of bestiality of the German soldiers that was worse than the murder of the passengers upon the Lusitania?

Why, Mr. President, does Mr. George Creel, the publicity man, employed presumably to help us win this war against the most cruel and unscrupulous enemy that ever organized a military force, deny the sworn testimony that was collected only a few days ago by British officials, many of them officers, that a German submarine sunk an allied hospital ship off the Irish coast, and when the passengers—the nurses, the angels of mercy to the suffering soldiers of the allies—were struggling in the water, that this submarine went from one boat to another and sought to destroy them in order that no trace of their crime should be left? Does he deny that—the sworn testimony recorded and kept in official records of the men who were eyewitnesses to that deed?

Why, Mr. President, it is somewhat surprising—and that is the reason I am speaking of it—to know that a man for whom the Government of the United States has furnished several million dollars to aid us by the proper kind of publicity in this war, is using the name of Gen. Pershing and that of the Secretary of War to defend the Germans against the charge of cruelty which all the world knows is true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, will the Senator put in concrete form what he charges against Mr. Creel and what by implication he charges against the Secretary of War or Gen. Pershing? I have not been able to gather what it is he charges.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Was the Senator present when I began to speak about this matter?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I heard something; but it seems to me the Senator goes far beyond anything that is shown by way of quotation. What is it that Mr. Creel has said which justifies the statement that he is defending Germany or that the Secretary of War is defending Germany?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I read it, Mr. President, from this paper.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator quote a sentence from it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have already quoted the sentence, but if the Senator desires I can read it again.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have not heard anything that justifies what the Senator is saying.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That makes an issue between the Senator and myself as to the deduction to be drawn from and the application which is to be made of these facts.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator from what paper he is quoting?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Washington Post. This is the statement which I read in the beginning of my remarks on this subject:

> Statements of German cruelties attributed by a St. Louis newspaper to an unnamed sergeant of the American Expeditionary Forces sent to the United States to assist in the third liberty loan are denied by Gen. Pershing in a cablegram which has been made public by the War Department. Gen. Pershing recommended that if the sergeant was quoted correctly, he be returned immediately to France for active duty.

They quote the very words, presumably, that the sergeant used. I am unable to believe that this newspaper could have had that exact language and published a statement in this circumstantial form, unless the statement contained in the article that it was published by the War Department is true. The connection in which I referred to Mr. George Creel was this, and I stated quite explicitly what connection I attached to Mr. Creel in the matter, that from past experience matters of publicity put out by the War Department are handled by Mr. Creel; and I presume that this matter was published by the Publicity Committee, of which Mr. Creel is chairman. That is the function of the committee, and that has been the practice of the committee.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Senator has merely quoted from that newspaper the statement that the War Department has made public certain statements. Has the Senator investigated to know whether or not the War Department has done that thing?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have investigated by reading this article and forming an opinion, which I have just stated, that it bears evidence of its truth on its face—intrinsic evidence of truth.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the evidence?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The evidence of it is the specific language which is quoted there, and the fact that this newspaper is published only a few blocks away from the War Department, and that I can not conceive how they would have the audacity to publish in the middle of the editorial page a statement that this information was given out by the War Department, unless it was given out by the War Department. If that is not true, the Senator will have ample opportunity to show that it is not true.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is charging here that the War Department has made a public statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not charging anything of the kind. I am reading here, and charging that there was published this morning in a newspaper in this city, the statement which I read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How can the Senator hold the War Department responsible for a statement published in a newspaper when he has not even investigated to find out whether it is true or not?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator deny that the War Department gave this information to the Washington Post?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no knowledge whatever of it; but before I charged the War Department with having made a public statement I would know that the War Department had made it, and the Senator evidently has not done that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. How did the newspaper get the information if the War Department did not give it out?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator is holding the War Department responsible for a public statement, the Senator certainly ought to be able to point to the statement.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am pointing to the statement. I have read the satement. If it is not true, the Senator can combat it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has not read the statement made by the War Department. The Senator has never seen the statement made by the War Department.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have read the statement made by the War Department.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have read it two or three times, and the Senator can read it in the RECORD to-morrow.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is not the statement of the War Department; that is a statement by a newspaper.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is a statement by a newspaper, quoting a statement from the War Department. Now, the Senator has made an issue here. I saw enough in this article to justify me in calling attention to it, in view of the circumstances, and the fact that it indicated that it was given out from the War Department. The Senator from Nebraska questions whether or not this was given out by the War Department. If the Senator attaches to it the importance that I attach to it, let him at some future hour, this afternoon or to-morrow, bring his proof that the presumption created by the publication of an article of this kind is not true.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. HITCHCOCK addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin. Then I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator whether one of the statements which the War Department denies and Gen. Pershing denies is that our soldiers have had their ears cut off and then have been sent back by the Germans and told that they wanted to fight men?

Mr. POINDEXTER. One of the statements made by the sergeant was that he had seen a soldier who had been so treated by the Germans.

Mr. LENROOT. And that statement the War Department and Gen. Pershing deny?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, I want to ask the Senator whether he does not believe that Gen. Pershing and the War Department know whether that is a practice upon the part of Germany, to cut off the ears of our soldiers and to send them back?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I presume they do.

Mr. LENROOT. And is it not very proper, if it is not true, that they should deny it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think so. In view of innumerable cruelties practiced by the Germans, I do not think the Secretary of War is called upon to defend them on this score.

Mr. LENROOT. I want to ask the Senator whether the mothers of our boys "over there" are not suffering enough without being terror-stricken with the idea that their boys are to be mutilated as a practice in the manner indicated by that sergeant, and whether it is not the duty of Gen. Pershing and of the War Department, if that be not true, to deny it?

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Wisconsin has made a speech on a mistaken apprehension of the facts about which he is talking. There is not anything in the article, which I have read verbatim, quoting from the sergeant, which says that they made a practice of cutting off soldiers' ears. He said that he saw a soldier who had his ears cut off. He said nothing about any practice.

Now, I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that these cruelties which the world knows have been perpetrated by Germany upon prisoners, upon women, and upon children, do not appeal to me because of the particular individual that suffers from them. I do not know any of those individuals. If a sergeant says that a soldier had his ears cut off, I do not know what soldier that was. I am not acquainted with him.

Consequently I can not have any personal sympathy with the soldier. He is an unknown person to me. It is the entire course of conduct of Germany in this war which appeals to me and which I am talking about. It does not make any difference in principle in this matter, or to me in my views upon it, whether a soldier has his ears cut off or whether he has his throat cut. There has been an official report made to the War Department by the officers in command of certain forces of ours on the front that a prisoner of ours in German hands had his throat cut. I say that that was inhuman, barbarous, contrary to the rules of war; and that there is official proof of it, and that I do not see, as a matter of propriety and policy of the Government, any occasion to issue an official denial of the statement of this sergeant that he saw a soldier with his ears cut off; for if Gen. Pershing ever said anything about the matter at all, he does not say that there was not a soldier with his ears cut off. It would not make any difference whether he had his ears cut off or whether he had his throat cut, as I said before, and it would not make any difference which one of the soldiers it was any more than it makes a difference whether the Germans, after having put on the deck of a submarine a number of American sailors whom they had captured, closed the hatches, and submerged the submarine, and left the prisoners to die in the icy waters of the ocean. I think that is just as bad as having a man's ears cut off; and in view of those things, which are corroborated and proved and known, to my satisfaction, at least, I do not think that our publicity agent or our War Department is called upon to enter into a campaign of defense of any charge of cruelty against the Germans.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The only point of my inquiry was because there was an inference drawn that that was a general practice. If it was not true, I think it is the duty of the War Department to deny it. The parents of these boys are suffering agonies enough now without being led to believe that unspeakable outrages are to be committed upon all of our American soldiers who may be captured. I do not see that anything can be accomplished by adding that agony to them. Our boys are fighting to the utmost. I know of nothing that will aid us in winning the war by the recital of these things, if they are not true, as a practice.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think the Senator from Wisconsin should read the report of Lord Bryce, the Evidence and Documents Laid Before the Committee on Alleged German Outrages. The testimony taken by this committee was taken from Belgian soldiers and British officials, and recites the practices of the German Army and German soldiers in torturing civilians in Belgium.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I had that in mind; and I will ask the Senator from New Jersey, while he is speaking, if he will give the specific title of that document, so that anyone who desires to do so can refer to it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. This document is a report of alleged German outrages, and the title is, Evidence and Documents Laid Before the Committee on Alleged German Outrages. The committee was appointed by the English Government, and presided over by the Right Hon. Viscount Bryce, who was the chairman of the committee. I have read that for the first time recently; and I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the tortures and outrages on civilians, on women and children, are far greater and far more painful than the cutting off of soldiers' ears.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I am familiar with that document, and I fully believe that those unspeakable outrages have been committed upon civilians. I would be the last one to deny it from the reading that I have had. The only point of my inquiry, Mr. President, is this: Are these outrages being committed upon American soldiers as a practice? I do not believe they are, because the German Army well know that if they attempted that upon our soldiers or those of our allies there would be found means of retaliation, if necessary, that would prevent the practice.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I just say, in honor of the American soldier, that the American soldier will never retaliate in like kind?

Mr. LENROOT. I did not mean in that respect. There are other means to be found, other than like retaliation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I read only this morning a report given by a Norwegian gentleman of education and distinction, who has just returned from a visit to Germany, of the conditions of the war prisoners of Germany at one of the prison camps which he visited and the pitiably small amount of food which they received. He stated that they were required to work two shifts a day, one at day and one at night, the same men. He said that they were living in a shed that was filthy and uninhabitable, unfit for even a beast to occupy; that their clothing was in rags; that a person could not tell from their looks what nation they belonged to; that they were emaciated; that disease was rampant among them; and that they had no medical attention. Those reports from reliable sources have been very numerous, to such an extent that there is not any doubt about the prevalence of those conditions. However, there may be exceptions here and there in the treatment of prisoners by Germany.

My attention has just been called by a colleague to this statement in the Washington Post of July 13. Speaking of German inhumanities, it says:

The latest is that related by Naval Paymaster Hughes, of England. A British patrol boat discovered a derelict submarine which had become unmanageable. Her crew was taken off and preparations were made to destroy the submarine with a depth bomb. The commander of the patrol asked the German captain if all were safely off the U-boat and was assured that no one was left on board. A tapping was heard, however, which aroused suspicion, and an investigation revealed four British seamen who had been locked in a room of the submarine. The German captain had concealed their presence, hoping that they would be killed when the submarine was destroyed.

I do not know whether that is true or not; but it is quite specific, and the name of the witness is given, he having been one of those who captured this German U-boat. But, Mr. President, for three years the French Government, through competent men, has been collecting official proof of the cruelties and bestialities of the German Army. They have preserved not only documentary evidence but human evidence, in the bodies and the mutilated remains of women and children who have suffered from the unspeakable rapine of these people. A few days ago report after report was published throughout the world, in such repetition and from such sources that there could be no reasonable doubt about it, that the Germans bombarded hospitals in France, and that in one hospital in Belgium 54 Belgian nurses were killed by German bombs. They war upon the helpless. If a mother should tear the toothless gums of her babe from her breast and stamp it under her feet with the cry, "Hail, Germany!" it would be a fit picture of the spirit of ruthless might, and of an army that takes pride in making war by armed men upon helpless and unarmed women and children. That is why, Mr. President, with the acceptance by the world of the truth of these things, I resent the War Department coming to the defense of a charge of cruelty against Germany; and the particular acts are entirely immaterial.

Mr. President, I do not know whether Gen. Pershing was responsible for the statement referred to there or not, and personally it would not make any difference in the position which I take about it; but I have seen so many false statements put out by the Publicity Bureau in regard to airplanes, for instance, deliberate falsehoods, which were persisted in after the attention of this committee had been called to their falsity, that I would not condemn Gen. Pershing or attribute any act to him without further evidence than the assertion of this Publicity Committee that he had sent a cablegram. I have known a good many things for which credit was sought by attaching to them the name of Gen. Pershing.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator credits the article in so far as it implicates the Secretary of War, but doubts it in so far as it mentions Gen. Pershing?

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is an entirely different matter. I would say that it is sufficient evidence, to my mind, that this information was given out by the Secretary of War. It does not attribute any statement of fact as to German practices to the Secretary of War. Whether it came through the Publicity Bureau or not, I am not informed. The presumption is that it would come through the Publicity Bureau. What I said was that it was immaterial to me, in what I have said about it, whether Gen. Pershing sent this cablegram or not, but that I would be prepared to learn that Gen. Pershing did not send the cablegram—at least, not for publication—because of the experience that we have had with the Publicity Committee as to the reliability of its statements.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I may say in the beginning that I was introduced to Mr. Creel on one occasion. I never had two minutes' conversation with him, and I have never seen him since. I never saw him before. But such attacks have been made on him here in criticism that I feel, in fairness to him and in common justice and decency, Mr. Creel's statement, which he submitted in a letter to Hon. EDWARD W. POU, chairman of the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., May 29, 1918, should be printed in the RECORD, and I ask to have it printed in the RECORD. If there is objection, I shall read it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. FLETCHER. It covers many of the comments which have been made adverse to him, and especially with reference to the free complaints that have been urged in connection with his statement about airplanes.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC INFORMATION,
Washington, D. C., May 29, 1918.

Hon. EDWARD W. POU,
Chairman Committee on Rules, House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. POU: I attach herewith a list that shows every man and woman in the employ of the Committee on Public Information, both paid and volunteer. While I appreciate your courteous explanation that the request was not a formal action, I beg you to believe that there is no activity of this committee that is not open to any Member of Congress at any time.

For your information, the Office of Military Intelligence makes continuous investigation of my personnel, and if individual reports are desired I shall be glad to furnish them.

I am glad also to make frank and specific answer to the charges against me that you are generous enough to put in answerable form.

(1) I am not a Socialist, have never been identified with the Socialist organization in any particular. I never voted a Socialist ticket, and dissent absolutely from the fundamental tenets of the Socialist faith.

(2) Instead of holding a contempt for our form of government, I believe in it with all the strength of my being. Democracy is a religion with me, and throughout my whole adult life I have preached America as the hope of the world.

(3) The articles that constitute my alleged attacks upon the Constitution were written in 1910 in Colorado in support of the initiative, referendum, and recall. Every word I wrote had the complete approval of Senator Thomas M. Patterson, owner of the paper, as fine and loyal an American as ever lived, and all three propositions were indorsed at the polls by a large majority.

(4) Not a single employee belongs or has ever belonged to the I. W. W. If any proof can be brought that this is not the case, I will discharge the person at once. As I have stated, Military Intelligence investigates my personnel continuously, with the view to making certain that every man and woman stands absolutely behind the Government in what I believe to be a just and holy war.

(5) With regard to the news releases of the committee, it must be borne in mind that no news release originates in this office. We are simply the machinery which puts out the material prepared by the various departments.

It is to be remembered also that while the committee during the year of its existence has issued thousands of releases, only three of this vast number have ever been questioned as to absolute accuracy.

The first of these, a direct charge that the Fourth of July statement was a fake, and that our transports had not been attacked by a submarine, was met fully by the report of Admiral Gleaves.

The second complaint, concerned with certain captions for airplane photographs, was largely due to a confusion between training planes and battle planes. The captions referred to training-plane production, and the pictures showed clearly that the machines were training planes. There was the feeling, however, that people might be led to think that battle planes were intended, and the pictures were withdrawn.

The third, a release bearing upon airplane production and shipment, came to us with explicit indorsement that we were without right to question.

A system of checking and verification is now permitted that will hereafter guard effectively against error.

(6) The charge of partisanship is one that I would like to have thrashed out as quickly and thoroughly as may be, for not only does it weaken the work of this committee but it shames the thousands of devoted men, Democrats and Republicans alike, who are giving themselves so whole-heartedly to the committee's work. I attach herewith a list showing the political affiliations of my division heads; and I beg to say, sir, that not until I asked for this list yesterday was this subject ever brought up in this committee or even thought of.

Whether in the issuance of pamphlets prepared by 3,000 leading historians, or in the speeches of 35,000 Four-Minute Men, or in the generous contributions of the artists, advertising experts, and writers of America, or in the formation of organizations to express the loyalty of the foreign born. I challenge anyone to prove a single act even remotely soiled by political prejudice.

Please consider me absolutely at your service, either through correspondence or, preferably, directly and personally. The work of the Committee on Public Information is now so far flung, reaching into every community of the United States and to every country of the world, that understanding is a vital necessity, and it is this understanding that I am willing to advance by any means that you or your associates may suggest.

Believe me, very sincerely, GEORGE CREEL, Chairman.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, let me say this also: I presume it happens on every occasion when there have been conflicts of this kind, people in every war, people not only in public life, but people in private life, have had comments to make about how the war should be conducted. They criticize those who have been charged with the responsibility of fighting the battles to a victorious conclusion. They have from time to time made observations about what should be done and about what should not be done, and that, I take it, has been the case for a period as far as memory reaches back.

In the June issue of the San Francisco Star there is quite an interesting little article, and I commend it to the consideration not only of Senators, but to those outside of this Chamber who indulge in like criticisms:

A WAR 2,000 YEARS AGO.

Lucius Æmilius Paulus, a Roman consul, who had been selected to conduct the war with the Macedonians, B. C. 168, went out from the Senate house into the assembly of the people and addressed them as follows:

"In every circle, and, truly, at every table there are people who lead armies into Macedonia; who know where the camp ought to be placed; what posts ought to be occupied by troops; when and through what pass Macedonia should be entered; where magazines should be formed; how provisions should be conveyed by land and sea; and when it is proper to engage the enemy, when to lie quiet. And they not only determine what is best to be done, but if anything is done in any other manner than what they have pointed out, they arraign the consul as if he were on his trial. These are great impediments to those who have the management of affairs, for everyone can not encounter injurious reports with the same constancy and firmness of mind as Fabius did, who chose to let his own authority be diminished through the folly of the people, rather than to mismanage the public business with a high reputation. I am not one of those who think that commanders ought never to receive advice; on the contrary, I should deem that man more proud than wise who did everything of his own single judgment. What, then, is my opinion? That commanders should be counseled chiefly by persons of known talent; by those, especially, who are skilled in the art of war and who have been taught by experience; and, next, by those who are present at the scene of action, who see the country, who see the enemy, who see the advantages that occasions offer, and who, embarked, as it were, in the same ship, are sharers of the danger. If therefore anyone thinks himself qualified to give advice respecting the war which I am to conduct which may prove advantageous to the public, let him not refuse his assistance to the state, but let him come with me into Macedonia. He shall be furnished by me with a ship, a horse, a tent, and even with his traveling charges. But if he thinks this too much trouble and prefers the repose of a city life to the toils of war, let him not on land assume the office of a pilot."

You will find this in Livy, Book XLIV, chapter 22, delivered 168 years before Christ, and it applies to the situation to-day.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I believe I voice the view of many of the Senators when I ask consideration for House joint resolution 309, that was before the Senate all day yesterday and the day before, and upon which I hope we will vote to-day, and vote favorably. It is a joint resolution authorizing the President in time of war to supervise or take possession and control of telegraph and telephone and cable lines. It is a resolution which is regularly before the Senate, but which has not been considered to-day.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator must excuse me.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I thought the Senator made a motion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not yield to the Senator.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, this joint resolution should cause much less hesitation than many important measures which the Senate has adopted. Telegraph lines are so nearly allied to the postal service it would be no great innovation if we took them over and operated them in time of peace. Telephone lines, when located in cities, can only be satisfactorily operated where one line exists. Competition between them is a burden on the public, lessening the efficiency of the service. Even if these lines were taken over and operated by the Government it would be no serious innovation.

But, Mr. President, this joint resolution does not provide for Government ownership. It does not suggest Government ownership or operation in time of peace. It is carefully limited to the war. The authority to supervise, the authority to take possession, the authority to operate is in three different places expressly limited to the war, and the end of the war is designated by the joint resolution as the time when the proclamation that a treaty of peace has been signed is made by the President.

So, Mr. President, in considering this joint resolution we have not before us the problem of Government ownership or of Government operation in time of peace.

Again, Mr. President, there is a limitation as to the circumstances under which the use shall be made. The President is authorized and empowered, when he shall deem it necessary to the national security or defense, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, radio system or systems, or any part thereof, only when necessary for the national security or defense.

On Monday morning I introduced a resolution to discharge the committee. I did so because I heard it was contemplated that a month should be taken to investigate the resolution, to take testimony about it. I can see no testimony that could be taken that would be of any value. I can conceive of no testimony that in any sense is essential. We have from the House the statement of the Secretary of War, the statement of the Secretary of the Navy, the statement of the Postmaster General, approved by the President, that this resolution is needed as a safeguard of our service during the war.

It is suggested that they have not gone into the details to show why it is needed. Mr. President, I can see why it is needed without any information from them.

I should like to see a cable devoted exclusively to the service of the War Department, with telegraphic connections from this side of the ocean into the office of the Chief of Staff, and with telegraphic connections from the other side into the headquarters of Gen. Pershing. Such a cable and telegraph service should be devoted solely to communications from the Chief of Staff to the commanding general on the other side.

Mr. President, our long-distance service, whether by cable or telephone, is needed continuously for our military affairs. It is needed to a great extent for our Army and our naval operations. I do not need to be told even by the Secretary of either of these departments that, controlled by the Government and operated by the Government, this service can be made more effective, more stable, more complete. I know it myself. I do not accept the view of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] that these Secretaries are commanders or are directors of the Senate, but I do accept the view that their opinions upon this subject are valuable and entitled to weight.

I wish to see the Government take control of the long-distance wires because I believe it will strengthen us in handling the service required to conduct this war. I wish to see the Government exclusively use one cable for communication from the office of the Chief of Staff to the office of Gen. Pershing.

Mr. President, we know that there are some who are disloyal in the United States. The operation of these long-distance means of communication inside of our own country by the Government will hinder and deter their use by the disloyal. If used, it will be easier to learn what is being done. If the use is stopped, then a substantial hindrance is placed upon their operations inside of our own country.

I see no harm that can come to the public in any way from this operation by the Government. As far as the public is concerned, their service will be the same as it is now. There will be no injury, no revolutionary change of conditions produced, but substantial benefit. We can see ourselves, if we dispassionately consider the subject, that by operating long-distance wires additional strength will come to the Government in the conduct of the war.

Then, Mr. President, why take testimony to tell us what to do? Why waste a month with any such line of procedure by a committee?

The committee did right to report this joint resolution back to us with a favorable recommendation. Whose testimony did you want? What kind of testimony did you want? You have the opinion of those representatives of our Government that they needed it and wanted it. We see without testimony that it will be of substantial value. If they have further details, they might have furnished them, but I doubt the propriety of making them public. We do not need them. I know by the application of common sense and practical experience in business matters that we do serve and do strengthen the administration of our military affairs by the exercise of this authority.

But it may be suggested that the owners of the property were entitled to a hearing. If the joint resolution did not absolutely guard the rights of the owners of the property, I would say "Yes," but it completely guards them. This resolution will constitute an exercise of the power of eminent domain by the Government for the temporary supervision or temporary operation of these properties.

To exercise that privilege just compensation must be made. I am one of those who believe that the act giving the authority should always provide in its own terms for the completest opportunity to the party whose property is taken or used to obtain full compensation. This joint resolution does that. It declares that the property shall only be used or interfered with upon just compensation. It provides further that the President may name the compensation, not binding upon the party. That means that the President may agree with them upon compensation, if he can. If he fails to do so, he names an amount, 75 per cent of which they may receive at once. But that does not conclude there. The resolution provides further that the party in interest whose property is to be used shall then have the right to go to the courts, retaining at once 75 per cent of the proposed compensation. They go to the courts to fix the total compensation, and the Government undertakes to pay it.

That, Mr. President, is my conception of the fair and legal way to exercise the power of eminent domain. So the House has sent us a joint resolution entirely safeguarding the right of the property owners and entirely furnishing to them a complete recognition of those rights with the privilege of appealing from the opinion of the President to the court and establishing their full value before the court, receiving in the meantime 75 per cent of the amount the President was willing to pay them.

Mr. President, I am gratified that the committee gave us this report. I see nothing in the measure that alarms. The rights of the owners are fully preserved. The service to the general public will be preserved. The service to the Government during the war will be increased. The benefits from that service I can well see, and I favor immediate action.

I shall not detain the Senate. I hope the joint resolution will pass, and pass to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McKELLAR in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], which will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 7, strike out the word "telephone" and the comma.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before any of these amendments are voted upon, I beg to say that on yesterday, late in the afternoon, I received a telegram from Mr. Rush Taggart, general counsel of the Western Union Telegraph Co. This telegram quotes certain stipulations in the contracts between the Western Union Telegraph Co. and some of the English companies under which the Western Union Telegraph Co. obtain certain rights and privileges over the cable lines and certain landing rights and privileges in Great Britain. After quoting these provisions of the leases and contracts, the general counsel concludes the telegram with this sentence:

In view of these provisions, as well as the provisions in the lease, I see no way in which the rights of the Western Union to the cables can be protected without the consent of the English Government under the resolution now before the Senate.

Mr. President, I have seen but have not had the opportunity to examine these contracts. They reached Washington on yesterday. We asked for them so that they might be incorporated in such hearings as we were permitted to have, but I think this telegram ought to be inserted in the RECORD, and I ask that it may be read for the information of Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NEW YORK, July 12, 1918.

Hon. ATLEE POMERENE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

My attention has just been called to a suggestion in your speech that Mr. Carlton promised to send you certain cable contracts, also opinion of company's attorney as to effect on these contracts of proposed resolution. Mr. Carlton's secretary requested of me Wednesday morning forwarding of cable contracts to Senator KELLOGG, but did not advise me respecting the forwarding of cable contracts to you. I did forward by mail to Senator KELLOGG copies of these cable contracts on Wednesday forenoon. It is too late now probably to forward the cable contracts so as to advise you respecting the stipulation therein, but the leases of the English cables contain this stipulation:

"The Western Union will not mortgage, charge, assign, transfer, underlet, or part with the possession or beneficial ownership of or permit to be taken in execution the premises for the time being comprised in the demise hereby made or any part thereof, but so that this present covenant and provision shall not prevent the Western Union Co. from assigning its interest under this present lease in the said premises along with its entire udertaking (including its present and future land line system) to any other responsible company provided that such company shall first have entered into a deed of covenant with the Anglo Co., assuming liability for and covenanting to perform and observe all the obligations and liabilities of the Western Union Co. under this present lease.

"Provided, nevertheless, that no such assignment or deed of covenant shall operate to release the Western Union Co. from its liabilities under this present lease or the covenants on its part herein contained, but that notwithstanding any such assignment or the execution of any such deed of covenant as aforseaid the Western Union Co. shall remain and be liable to the Anglo Co. for the payment of all the rents or other yearly sums and the performance and observance of all the covenants and conditions by and in these presents reserved made payable and contained."

Leases by the English cable companies to the Western Union provide for the English companies securing landing rights for the Western Union, and in 1914 such landing rights secured by the Western Union and the Anglo American contained the following as article 1:

"If and whenever in the opinion of one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state an emergency shall have arisen in which it is expedient for the public service that His Majesty's Government shall have control over the transmission of messages by the cables hereby licensed it shall be lawful for the said secretary of state by warrant under his hand to direct and cause so much of the works of the two companies or either of them as are within the United Kingdom or the territorial waters thereof or any part of such works to be taken possession of in the name and on behalf of His Majesty and to be used for His Majesty's service and subject thereto for such ordinary service as to the said secretary of state may seem fit and in that event any person authorized by the said secretary of state may enter upon the offices and works of the two companies or either of them or on any part of such works and take possession thereof and use the same as aforesaid."

The two cables leased by the American Telegraph & Cable Co. to the Western Union in 1882 were landed on the shores of England under an agreement with a similar provision to that above quoted respecting the Anglo American Cable Co.'s cables. The landing right of the Direct, the other English company, is under consideration by the English Government and has not been fully formulated, but the English Government will doubtless insist upon the reservation of the same right with respect to these cables. In view of these provisions as well as the provisions in the lease, I see no way in which the rights of the Western Union to the cables can be protected without the consent of the English Government under the resolution now before the Senate.

RUSH TAGGART, General Counsel.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I express no opinion as to the soundness or unsoundness of Mr. Taggart's view, but I may say that I have known Mr. Taggart for 25 or 30 years. He is one of the ablest lawyers in this country and any view that he may express on any legal proposition is worthy the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. President, it was perhaps by accident that it was developed in the hearings which we had that the Western Union Telegraph Co. had these cable and landing rights and of the possibility of their being forfeited in the event that the Government attempted to take them over. I submit that if by the taking over of all these cable and landing rights we should take a step which would result in their forfeiture, it would operate as a serious injury to the Western Union Telegraph Co., and the Government would be responsible in damages, for which the company could get compensation under the pending resolution.

Mr. President, I had not intended, and do not now intend, to address the Senate at length, but I think the telegram which I have just submitted demonstrates the wisdom of the course taken by the small minority of the committee who insisted that there ought to be some hearings before attempting to legislate upon a matter of such great importance.

I have no doubt this joint resolution is going to pass; I want the RECORD to show what the possibilities are in the event the authority should be exercised which it confers, so that we may avoid possible pitfalls.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to ask the insertion in the RECORD, without reading, of two telegrams; one with relation to the prohibition amendment now pending and the pending stimulation of the Agriculture bill, and one from certain employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. relating to the joint resolution now under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams referred to are as follows:

WILMINGTON, N. C., July 11, 1918.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

May we, the undersigned loyal citizens and employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., this office, convey through you the following expressions:

We are thoroughly in accord with any plan considered a necessary war measure. The recent strike agitation was entirely engineered by outside interests, in which we had no part. In the event Government control is deemed necessary, we assume that the various beneficial plans inaugurated by the company for its employees, many of whom have served their entire life and who are anticipating these benefits, will not be discontinued.

A. J. Lee, jr., L. P. Wood, R. L. Davis, R. H. Orrell, W. J. Hines, J. E. Wood, Adolf Otersen, M. L. Kingsbury, E. L. Spooner, Mary Davis, John Shinberger, Lizzie Jarrot, Bernard Spooner, Mrs. R. L. Throp, Mabrey Turner, Thelma Chestnutt, Katie C. George, and J. T. Hughes.

FRANKLINTON, N. C., July 12, 1918.

Hon. F. M. SIMMONS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Raleigh District Conference of Methodist Episcopal Church South request you to present to the Senate their memorial that the Senate pass immediately the measure prohibiting the manufacture and sale during the war of all intoxicating liquors. Conservation of precious food and preservation of more precious manhood demands this action.

T. A. SIKES.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS. With the kind consent of the Senator from Ohio, I beg to tender communications between former Postmaster General Wanamaker and present Postmaster General Burleson, occupying a space of not more than an inch, and I ask to have them printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Public Ledger, July 12, 1918.]

JOHN WANAMAKER REPLYING TO CONGRATULATIONS ON HIS EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY—NATAL-DAY TELEGRAMS DELUGE WANAMAKER—EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY ANNIVERSARY OF MERCHANT IS WIDELY REMEMBERED.

John Wanamaker quietly observed his eightieth birthday anniversary at his estate, Lindenhurst, Jenkintown, yesterday. Mr. Wanamaker received numerous messages of congratulation from all parts of the country, from members of the Cabinet, Senators, and other men of prominence.

A delegation of department-store chiefs from the John Wanamaker Store presented him with a gold plaque bearing a portrait of Marshal Joffre and his famous words on the eve of the battle of the Marne. Mr. Wanamaker is a warm admirer of the great French general.

In acknowledging the congratulatory messages Mr. Wanamaker praised the results of the President and the administration. * * * To A. S. Burleson, Postmaster General of the United States, Mr. Wanamaker sent this reply:

"I am deeply touched by your fraternal and thoughtful birthday telegram, notwithstanding your busy life. I have always had visions, but have only worked out half of them. Benjamin Franklin, your first predecessor, had nothing to do in comparison with what you have had to do. No other man save our mighty and wise President has had such a difficult responsibility to meet as yourself, careless commercial people having blindly ignored the hardships of postal management with railroad and other transportation, crippled for rolling stock, coal, and other war necessities, absolutely requiring preference in movement. Your work as Postmaster General will stand out as a masterpiece of excellence, considered in the light of facts. As the oldest Postmaster General now living, for myself and tens of thousands of business people, we call upon you, Mr. Postmaster General, to receive our benediction."

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the telegram submitted along with the address which my colleague [Mr. POMERENE] has given to the Senate on this subject very strikingly points out the lack of wisdom in the Congress taking this leap in the dark. I am not deeply concerned, Mr. President, about the interests of the companies involved in this movement toward Federal ownership and control, although I think they are entitled to consideration. I think it is a fair statement that probably the greater number of the telephone companies of the country would like to be taken under the Government wing.

Perhaps I ought to say at this time, Mr. President, that I am a prejudiced witness in this case. I believe I know as much about the telephone business as does any Senator in this body. I am not sure but that I know more about it than a good many of those who are proposing Government ownership and control. So there may not be any misunderstanding, I want it to go into the RECORD that I am a director of a so-called independent telephone company; and, if you ask me, I will tell you that it is one of the best in the United States; and the agents of the Federal Government who have been promoting Government ownership have done that institution the credit of making a very careful examination of it. My connection with that company, in a very small way, has given me some information about the business itself. I have a rather intimate view of the wild financing of a perfectly highly intentioned endeavor to save the country from the horrors of monoply in telephony.

Let me venture to make the statement now that if there is any business in the world that ought to be a monopoly, it is that of the telephone. It ought to be a monopoly, and a regulated monopoly. When a man takes down a telephone receiver and makes a call he ought to have available any telephone that the wires will reach; and yet it is one of the singular comments on the changing character of public sentiment in this country that some 8 or 10 years ago, when in my town we instituted the first effort at unification in all this land and sought to bring the service under one system, the laws of Ohio were invoked to prevent us doing so on the ground that we were trying to restrain competition in a public service.

I think there are about 100,000 misguided men who have gone into the telephone business in the United States. It may not be illuminating, but it will be diverting, if I relate the fact that in my home city, perhaps 15 or 16 years ago, a small party of us concluded that the Central Union Co. was a heartless monopoly, making untold wealth at our expense, and we had the influence locally to secure a franchise to build a competing telephone system. We started to build one with the expenditure—the straightforward, honest expenditure—of $75,000. Then we demonstrated how much we did not know. When we had finished the enterprise on which we embarked we had expended about $300,000, and found ourselves called upon to back it up financially. It was in such a situation that we found ourselves competing in the telephone business. Seeing the endangered character of our investment, we called for an armistice in the competing conflict that was going on, and unification had its origin in that event. Out of unification, in spite of the opposition brought in the courts, we began uniting the telephone plants, and did unite them in my city. The example has been so helpful that unification has been going on throughout the country, and it ought to go on.

I venture to say if there is any one line of public-utility service in America that might reasonably come under Federal Government control it is the wire communication service of this country; and if it were now proposed as a deliberate peace proposition for the Government to take over that line of public service I would be very much inclined to give it friendly consideration, much as I am opposed to that school of political thought. My objection to the movement at this time is that we are seeking to establish a change in policy in the name of war.

Mr. President, I listened with a good deal of attention yesterday to the able remarks of the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and I recall that he said, if there were a real war emergency, if there were a present necessity for the seizure of the lines of communication in this country, the Chief Executive would take them over, else he would be unfaithful to his duties as such Chief Executive. I agree with that statement; and if the President believes that there is such an emergency, he ought to seize them.

I will say further, Mr. President, that I think I voice the sentiments of all who are opposed to the joint resolution when I say that, if it were officially stated that there is an emergency in this country demanding this grant of authority, there would not be a vote in this Chamber in opposition. I am not, however, as a Senator, content to accept a communication of the Chief Executive on so important a question in the form of a letter to some Member of Congress. It is a very simple thing officially to communicate to the Congress about so important a problem as this. The President is not lacking in readiness to communicate; he invariably does it well. I say now, if the Chief Executive believes that it is necessary to the successful conduct of the war that he must have this authority, or that it is likely that he must make this very radical change in our affairs, I will vote that authority. I will even go further, Senators. Much as I apprehend these excessive grants of power, much as I have been concerned about the changes going on in our representative form of government, I will go to the extreme limit of making the Chief Executive an absolute dictator in the United States to win the war. But my opposition rests in deluding the public and in making these great changes in our American institutions in the name of war when the emergency does not exist.

We all know how this question came up. It came up through the Executive and through the public press uttering his attitude and that of Cabinet officers because there was the threat of a strike. Well, I am not concerned about the threat of a strike, Mr. President. If the members of the organization which is known as the Union of Commercial Telegraphers in this country want to give a manifestation of their fitness to control the operations of the telegraph lines in this country by striking in this emergency, I for one, want to say, let them strike. We need just a little test on that policy in America right now.

There has been unlimited discussion on the floor here about the necessity of guarding the messages of the United States and making sure that we have a highly patriotic service. I would not think very much of the security of a service that was in the hands of an organization that would tie up the Government in stress of war.

The point I am trying to get at, Mr. President, in this rather rambling way is that this matter is being pressed upon Congress as a war necessity when no one in authority has had the courage to say so in an official way. Oh, I grant that there are Senators on this floor who have said as much, but their authority is no greater than my own. I am contending against this very radical change, made possible by the excuse of war. I am opposed to it, Senators, because we are doing so many things under that very same cloak. We have here pending the question of war-time prohibition. I thought we had disposed of the prohibition question a year ago, when I joined a two-thirds majority in this body in submitting to the States a Federal constitutional amendment for ratification; but notwithstanding that rational solution and disposition of the question, we are having it pending here almost every day as a special war measure, in spite of the pending decision of the people in the States.

The same thing relates to the great reform known as the enfranchisement of the women of the country. I think every Senator on this floor has had it drummed into his ears again and again and again that the Republic, to be consistent and to make a genuine fight for democracy, must make this grant of suffrage in order to make us effective in war. Why, Senators, I seek effectiveness in war with just as much earnestness as does any other man on this floor. I have made the ultimate statement; but I am weary of dragging in every social and economic reform that ever was dreamed of in the name of war, and I am weary of it because our judgment is not always best in times like these.

To make myself more clear, if I may: If the times were reasonably normal; if there were not so many undigested governmental undertakings; if we were not in a period when our course is marked by so many unavoidable failures; if we did not have before us the example of unending disappointments in the Railway Administration, I believe I would forsake my long-established opposition to Federal ownership, and consent to a deliberate consideration of this proposition; but the objection is that it is not before us as a question on its merits. No one pretends to believe that it is not designed to have this joint resolution passed to initiate Government ownership. I have yet to hear any Senator say that is not the purpose of this program to get the initial authority to take over these lines of communication and establish Government ownership and control. If that be true, I had rather consider it on its merits, not as a war measure, but as a deliberate change of governmental policy respecting our internal affairs.

I have been interested in reading the testimony of the Cabinet officers concerned with this movement. I do not know how anyone can misconstrue the statements of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, or the Postmaster General. They are all in favor of the altered plan; they have not anything else in mind; and I am wondering sometimes if this created emergency was not designed in the name of war to lay the foundation for this change.

The objection, Senators, to going into the business blindly might be elaborated upon to great extent. I think I said in the beginning that most of the telephone companies interested would be glad to see this action taken. I say that in absolute deliberation. I do not speak for the telegraph companies; but I do know that the telephone business and the telegraph business are so interwoven and so connected that one must of necessity go with the other; and I know, further, that there are more defunct institutions in the United States organized as telephone companies than in any other dozen lines of American business activity. That is an easy thing to understand. There never has been a field of such financial exploitation on a small scale. People seized upon the existing desire for competition. These companies were organized, bonded, preferred stock was issued, they were capitalized upon a fictitious scale, and then the operating forces were called upon to pay out all their resources in maintaining their stock and bond issues. The result was that the physical property belonging to the telephone companies in the United States has suffered a deterioration not found in any other line of business. It is rather an interesting point to know that there is not any other line of public service in the United States where the deterioration is so marked. I have forgotten the specific percentage allowed by the various public-utilities commissions in the States; but I happen to know that the outdoor property of a modern or any telephone institution deteriorates very much more rapidly than 10 per cent a year; and, unless the company is everlastingly devoting a large share of its resources to maintenance, it soon becomes little more than a scrap heap. I tell you, Senators, that there are 5,000 such scrap heaps in the United States today that would be very gladly turned over to the United States Government. I make this emphatic, because I do not want to be in the attitude of speaking solely for so-called vested property rights. I want the Congress, before it takes this leap toward Government ownership and control, to take the necessary steps to find out what it is getting and to make provision to protect the public in the charge for the service.

I do not know that it is becoming to bring in the railroad question again, but we have witnessed the remarkable spectacle of an advance in railroad rates such as no one would have dared to suggest under private ownership and control. In my home city, for example, where we have great lime and stone interests, which are dependent upon the freight service of the railroads, we have found the business essentially paralyzed by an advance in freight rates of from 100 to 200 per cent, and in the passenger service of the railways it costs more than two and a quarter times as much to go from my home city to the capital of the State as it did under old conditions. I am not saying that that is not necessary, but I am saying that the public in the transfer from private ownership and control to public ownership and control has been called upon to pay in many instances more than 100 per cent advance for the service. Apply the same proposition to the communication lines of this country and you will find a popular unrest and a wide dissatisfaction, and justly so. Then, in this hour of unrest and anxiety and difficult public problems, why undertake one more when the necessity is not yet made apparent? Senators, we can express in this body the willingness that we have repeatedly shown to back up the Chief Executive and his administrative agents in every essential to win the war; but why must we be committed at this time to what I look upon as a fundamental change, probably impelled by those who have less concern about the tranquillity of the Republic than those who have yielded to the impelling movement?

I have just read, Mr. President, of a dangerous crisis in the cabinet of France, passed only yesterday, because the Socialists of that Republic attempted to interfere with some sort of a bank charter. I do not think, Mr. President, that the man who thrusts upon the Government a radical change in our domestic affairs at this time is a patriot in the highest sense. I have no objection to the advocate of a certain reform furthering his purposes as best he can from time to time; I have no objection to the Postmaster General urging the enlargement of his department of service in the Republic; I have no objection to the wide extension of unionism throughout the United States, because I can see it has its advantages to those concerned; but I do not think these things ought to be forced upon the Government in the name of war.

In passing, I wish to say, Senators, that one of the greatest embarrassments in the United States to-day is found in too much organization. I do not mean by that statement that I am assailing organized labor; I do not mean by that statement that I am assailing organized capital; but the country is running riotously in the direction of organization.

The other day, Mr. President, I met a dairyman from my State, and the experience was rather interesting. I have known him for fully 30 years; I have seen him grow in financial resources and in attainments from one who started to drive his own milk wagon into the owner of hundreds of acres of land and hundreds of head of dairy stock. He came to me not very long since with his complaint that it was not possible for a dairyman to prosper in times like these, and in the progress of our conversation I led him into a revealment. This is precisely what happened: He had been pursuing the tenor of his own way for years and had prospered thereby, but finally he entered an organization of his particular kind; and the cost expert, whose compensation lies in being expert and teaching cost systems, told my friend how much money he was losing by not paying the members of his family an adequate salary; how much money he was losing by not charging a sufficient overhead on the investment in land; how much he was losing by not charging an ample depreciation on his delivery wagons; and how much he was cheating himself by his overtime work without extra compensation for overtime. When he came to figure it all out under the revealed system he was theoretically losing money, although his course had been a prosperous one for the 30 years that I have known him.

I only cite the instance to show that in every branch of American activity we are organizing to further the interests of that particular branch. The professional men organize; business men organize; and experts are on salaries to promote the furtherance of the interests of the particular organization, and sometimes to convey the interests of those organizations to the Members of this body either by appeal or by threat, as one sometimes encounters it. The result is that we have organization against organization in every walk of life, and I think that is in a large degree responsible for the increased cost of living throughout the United States. However, I have only diverted on that line in passing.

Now, to get back to the consideration I have in mind. As has been pointed out, in the Senate there are two schools of thought. I am content that they shall thrash the question out in the deliberations of peace; I am content, if it is the judgment of the majority, that the Government shall undertake this large field of activity, if it can be undertaken at a rational time; but nobody knows, Mr. President, what the cost is to be; nobody knows the extent of the undertaking; and somebody ought to stand guard here and cry out against these enormously expensive experiments, for which somebody has to pay. I am perfectly amazed, Senators, that we go on here undertaking these new problems to cost millions upon millions. Let me stop, in passing, to ask, Is there any Senator on the floor, any advocate or opponent of the pending joint resolution, who knows anything like the sum involved in this undertaking? Does my colleague know?

Mr. POMERENE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not hear him.

Mr. HARDING. I am asking for some Senator to say how much is involved in this great undertaking of Government ownership and control.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Western Union Telegraph Co. has assets valued at $200,000,000 and corporate stock of $100,000,000. The Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. does about 20 per cent of the telegraph business of the country and the Western Union about 80 per cent. The telephone companies of the country, according to a statement made by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], are valued at $1,900,000,000.

Mr. HARDING. That is the telephone companies?

Mr. POMERENE. The telephone companies.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HARDING. I do.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. If the Senator will allow me, I think it would be very well to put into the RECORD at this point the figures given in certain tables that I have here from the Interstate Commerce Commission, showing the total investment of those telegraph and telephone companies reporting to the Interstate Commerce Commission up to and including 1917. Of course there are privately owned telephone companies that are not included, as they did not report to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The latest figures on the telegraph are as follows: Total investment in plant and equipment, $154,149,113; capital stock, $104,039,602; funded debt, $32,744,000. The telephone companies of all classes reporting for the year ending December 31, 1916, had a total investment for classes A, B, and C of $1,991,549,075 and total assets and liabilities of $2,221,800,157.

These tables give a complete statement of the investment in the telephone companies reporting.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I am very glad to have this interruption. I want to ask the distinguished Senator a question.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to his colleague?

Mr. HARDING. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. That does not include the radio systems, does it?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No. If it does, it is not so indicated here. I do not think the radio systems are included—I am sure they are not—in these tables.

Mr. POMERENE. And the statement does not include the cable systems?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I think the cable system is included. Just one minute.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HARDING. Surely.

Mr. KELLOGG. Cables are not included; radios are not included, because the telephone company has nothing whatever to do with the radio systems, nor has it anything to do with the cable systems or the telegraph systems.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me just a minute, I will read the terminology used by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Amongst them I find the Colorado Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., Commercial Pacific Cable Co., Kansas Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., Mackay Telegraph-Cable Co. (Louisiana), Mackay Telegraph-Cable Co. (Texas), Mexican Telegraph Co., North American Telegraph Co., Ohio Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (California), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Connecticut), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Delaware), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Illinois), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Indiana), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Iowa), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Kentucky), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Massachusetts), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Michigan), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Missouri), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Nebraska), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (New Jersey), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (New York), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Pennsylvania), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Tennessee), Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. of Texas, and Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. (Washington). Therefore the inference would be——

Mr. KELLOGG. But the figures the Senator was reading as the total investment, $1,991,549,075, have not anything at all to do with the telegraph companies.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; the figure of nearly $2,000,000 that I gave, as I have indicated, referred to the telephone companies. I turned to the telephone companies' figures. The figures for the telegraph companies are $96,161,140. That is the investment of the companies to which I have just called attention.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, while the chairman of the committee is on his feet, I want to ask him if he has any information as to what the Government expenditure is going to be in taking over these properties and securing its service alone, not thinking in any way of the maintenance of the service which the individual citizen gets?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, as I understand this question, of course it may be due to my obtuseness, but my understanding of it is that it is to enable the Government to assume control, if the circumstances justify it, of any part or the whole, if need may be. Of course, I do not suppose they can determine what will be the necessary subsequent procedure until the emergency has crystallized to a point where they will put their hands on whatever is necessary for the common defense; and then, perhaps—I am just making this as a suggestion—the legislation may take a line similar to that which was taken when, under the enabling act, the railroads were taken.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will it embarrass the Senator to say whether he thinks that that is all that is intended?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No, Mr. President; it would not embarrass the chairman. The fact of the business is, I should like to state right now, that the power asked is one that it seems to me we can not shirk, because the responsibility on our part is so to legislate as to give those who are to prosecute this war actively no reason for embarrassment; and then, when they shall have acted, the wisdom or unwisdom of their acts must necessarily be upon them, not upon us.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator say whether he thinks this movement is intended merely as a measure of war efficiency or necessity?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Well, Mr. President, I think it is.

Mr. HARDING. Does the Senator say he thinks that is all that is intended?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am not in a position where my thinking would change it or is necessary. It is those that we have charged with the responsibility of prosecuting this war that have to do the thinking as to what, in their opinion, is necessary.

Mr. HARDING. Will the Senator say what he thinks, then, of the purpose of the Cabinet officers who testified that they did not think the control should end with the war?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, so far as that is concerned, that is their opinion as to when it should end. The Senator and I are here to legislate upon a war emergency, as we did in the railroad proposition, where we said that the control should terminate definitely and specifically at a certain time, because I take it that this body is not going to commit itself without due consideration to Government ownership or to the socialistic tendency that some seem to believe has been injected here. As a matter of course, every one of us is going to give everything that is essential to win this war, and we are giving things that we would not dream of giving in times of peace.

While I am on my feet, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to say that I consider it a matter of congratulation to the American people that there does rise up a protest, in this body and out of it, whenever the accustomed privileges of democracy are invaded. They come around all right when they see that they must make the sacrifice in order to win this war; but it is very gratifying to some of us, at least, who do not believe in socialistic tendencies and in Government control of all sorts of things, to see that even with the menace of this tremendous war on us we are jealous of the fundamental principles of a rightly conducted democracy.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him whether he believes that if these lines are seized they will ever be restored to private ownership?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I believe that if these lines are seized, this very body that is granting this privilege for the sake of winning this war will protect the American people in their rights, as it is now trying to protect them by temporarily taking what seem to be their rights.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator makes it entirely clear.

Mr. President, my question is the basis of what I have tried to say, namely, that this measure, which is alleged to be here in response to a war emergency, is nothing more than the beginning of a policy of Government ownership and control; and, as I said in the beginning, I should not object to that, because I think this is a particular line of activity in which we might make that venture consistently, if anywhere. My objection to this grant of power without official notification of the emergency lies in the fact that we are making this leap in the dark; that we are making this change without reason or excuse, and we are doing it under this unlimited grant of power on the part of Congress and turning over the matter of policy as well as the execution of laws entirely to the Chief Executive of the Government. For that reason, Mr. President, I am opposed to the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HARDING. I was about to yield the floor.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I just want to ask the Senator a question. He has stated that he has not any serious objection to governmental ownership of these lines, but he does not want it done under the claim that it is a war emergency. Even taking that view, is it not better to have the experiment made during the war, to see with what success the operation of the lines can be conducted by the Government?

Mr. HARDING Mr. President, I am delighted to answer that question, because it involves a further feature of my objection.

I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I am opposed to the experiment now, because the Government has already undertaken so much that it is not doing the work as it ought. I do not mean to criticize. I have no desire at any time to rend the confidence of this country in its Government. The revelations have been sufficient. Nobody has had a word to say about the failure of the railway administration except as it applied to the transportation of fuel last winter. But it is a fact, nevertheless, that the handling of the railway problems in this country right now is little less than a scandal; not in any manner of dishonesty, not entirely along the lines of inefficiency, but inability to grasp the great task undertaken and to carry out the work as the Government ought to be able to do. I am not finding fault with it. It is too big a thing for any human agency unfamiliar with the task to grapple with and handle perfectly in so short a time. My objection is, expressed as a question, when there is not any necessity, why in this time undertake the things that we are not fitted to do? Why, Mr. President, with the undertakings incident to the War Risk Bureau, with the expansion of the War Department, with the addition of Government forces that come of railroad control and operation, with water transportation undertaken, we are overrun with a Federal organization that is not 40 per cent efficient.

Mr. President, if the Senator from Colorado will allow me to divert—and I have not meant to consume so much time—there are perfectly appalling things undertaken in this hour of experiment and adventure in Government control. I imagine that Senators, notwithstanding their sympathy with the housing movement, for example, will be utterly amazed when they learn what the day dreamers have undertaken at the expense of the American public. I had my attention called the other day to a housing movement in a section of the United States several miles from any civic or municipal center where we were building houses costing as high as $5,000 to $8,000 each, equipped with the most modern and complete and extravagant equipment that the most fortunate man in material affairs in the United States could wish for. I do not say that the man who toils for a daily wage is not entitled to all the comforts that any man can have, but my complaint is that in this great emergency, in this turmoil of the world, in this anxiety of the Republic, this saturnalia of expenditure for which somebody must pay, we are having the dreamers and the reformers and the idealists spending from the Public Treasury in this very impractical way. Now, that is only a phase. If we take over the telegraph and telephone systems, I do not know but that somebody will come along with an enormous Government expenditure that will very much improve the personal convenience of the man who seeks communication over the lines; but the problems involved are too enormous to divert the attention of the executive heads of the Government at this time.

I only say to the Senator from Colorado, if we are to make this experiment, let us do it when we have time, when we can give it consideration, when we are concerned with our internal affairs, and not at this time, when we are seeking to bend all the energies of the Republic to the winning of the war.

Mr. KING and Mr. SHAFROTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HARDING. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I wanted to ask the Senator, in view of the statement which he has just made—and I do it for information—if it is the organization over which Mr. Eidlitz presides that is embarking upon the expensive and extravagant and wholly unnecessary plan of building just alluded to? The reason why I make the inquiry is that I was advised, before we appropriated this large sum, that some of these faddists and dreamers were going to get control of the organization; that they proposed launching an extravagant scheme of building; they were going to construct buildings of the most modern type; they were going to put into them the finest sort of porcelain fixtures that would do credit to a millionaire's home, and so forth. In the light of the information I made inquiry immediately of various departments here, and registered a vigorous protest if that was the scheme which was involved, and insisted that if any money were appropriated it be utilized along legitimate and proper lines. I was told that those were not the plans, and that they were going to build temporary structures absolutely needed in those localities where governmental work was being prosecuted. If that plan has been departed from I think the Senator should tell us, and I think a resolution of inquiry might very properly be introduced and passed here to determine what the policy is.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, I will make this reply to the Senator from Utah: I did not rise to attack the policy of the Labor Department in dealing with the housing problem. I only cited it to show that we are undertaking too many things, and in this period of diversion from deliberate thought and deliberate progress we are doing so many impractical and extravagant things. In the particular instance to which I made allusion, just to show the idealists at work at Government expense, these homes, the lowest average cost of which, without the surroundings, was about $5,500 each, I believe, have window flower boxes with copper linings. Now, I think it is perfectly beautiful to have the flower boxes; but I have been married for 25 years, and trying to make a pleasant home, and I never had a copper-lined flower box in my life, and I have not felt that I was being seriously negligent in making myself comfortably surrounded. That is the point I am trying to make, Mr. President. In this hour of dreaming, and this perfectly unceasing flood of expenditures——

Mr. REED. What department is doing this? Who is doing it?

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from Missouri asks me what department is doing it. There is no question about the department. It is by order of the President under the Department of Labor. I will say, Mr. President—and I do not want to be misconstrued—that I voted for the housing appropriations. I assumed that we were going to relieve the crowded sections, and furnish comfortable, seemly homes to the men who are needed in furthering our war-industrial activities in this country. But instead of doing a thing like that, we are out on the highway of Utopia, and somebody who is not so far out on the highway is being called upon to pay.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. JONES of Washington addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. HARDING. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Ohio—with the Government in charge of the railways, and the Government in charge of the employment of labor, with a vast organization to bring the employer and employee together, with directions to raise large crops of food supplies, why it is, when immense acreages of potatoes were put in and are now ready for the market, that they are rotting in the fields, and yet I look on my grocery bill and find that in Washington I am paying $4 a bushel for potatoes that bring 35 cents in the field? That is a practical question; and if the Senator will pardon a grossly materialistic view of the situation, I should like to be enlightened. If the Government can do things so well, I should like to have cheaper pototoes.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois has charmed and enlightened me so often that I wish I might reciprocate and at this time give him some information about his "murphies"; but, as a matter of fact, I am not in intimate touch with the Food Administration, and I am utterly unable to explain. If the Senator from Missouri has information upon the potato question, I shall be glad to yield to him for a moment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have not been able to follow the Food Administration into the potato bins of the country; but I believe that if Senators will take the trouble to ascertain the wholesale prices that are being paid for potatoes, and in fact nearly all things going upon the table, they will ascertain two things: First, that the citizen of Washington, within the immediate shadow of the Capitol, is being robbed a good deal worse than the people of other cities; and, second, that there is a gap between the price that the producer receives and the price that the ultimate consumer pays that could not exist and would not exist if the law of supply and demand were permitted to work. For instance, you can pay 75 cents a pound for a good beefsteak in Washington, and yet if you will look at the wholesale prices of beef, the prices of beef on the hoof, you will find that it is not very much higher than it was when you could buy beefsteak at 30 cents or 35 cents a pound. But there has been a regulation, and as I do not want to be guilty of high treason I am not going to express my opinion further in regard to that regulation.

Mr. HARDING. Very well, Mr. President, I will absolve the Senator from Missouri, and yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to say, in response to the suggestion, that I saw in the paper the other day that the food representative here had authorized an increase in the price of potatoes, I think, to the consumers; in other words, permitting the retailers to raise the price of potatoes. But what I wanted to ask the Senator was if he can tell about how many rooms there are in the houses he has described?

Mr. HARDING. The houses described are supposed to contain four or five bedrooms. That is the only way I will attempt to describe them, because I asked the same question myself. When I found that the houses were costing from $5,000 to $8,000 apiece, I immediately asked how many workingmen they would accommodate; and the gentleman who answered me, and who was familiar with the subject as a bidder is familiar with it, told me that by using all of the bedrooms, and the family itself not being too large because of children, the house would accommodate an average of three workmen.

I have not pointed this out because I have wished to attack the policy. I thought from the beginning it would be very much that way. We are a curious people. We send our millions of soldiers to the front, and we give them the compensation of a dollar a day, and think nothing more about them than that we expect them to make the supreme sacrifice of life on the altar of their country; and then, when we find people who are rushing to Washington to get into the Government service in this hour, and there is a little inconvenience about rooming them, they are not content to accept some of the hardships incident to these difficult times, so we immediately propose to expend millions to provide for them in comfort, at twice or thrice or four times the compensation of a man who goes out to sacrifice his life for the preservation of our ideals of American liberty.

Of course, Mr. President, when it is perfectly possible to do these things, one does not object to the higher state of things and the more comfortable order that we are trying to bring about. I think the housing proposition, if worked out in a proper way, could be one of the most helpful things undertaken in this country. But, Mr. President, a state of war, when all the energy and all the best thought and all the sacrifices of the Republic are called for, is not the time to indulge in dreams like these, because in the end somebody must pay; and it is not merely the man of great means who is called upon to pay, but in the end the burden of debt and the burden of expenditure falls upon the American people. The man who is temporarily enjoying it will find that the burden comes upon him, too; and while we grieve and protest and proclaim about the high cost of living, everybody, in this spirit of idealism and uplift and higher compensation, is continually adding to the cost of living. I am not so much concerned about the cost to-day as I am about the aftermath; about how in the deliberations and the necessities of the after-the-war period we are going to adjust ourselves to anything akin to the normal state of human activities.

I think, Senators, we might very well give some thought to the time that is coming, and we might reasonably prepare for it by such limitations as we can well undertake. Begging pardon of Senators here for the delay which I have unintentionally brought about, let me finish in a sentence. I am opposed to the joint resolution that is pending here, because I know, as every Senator on this floor knows, the purpose of the resolution. It is the great socialistic adventure. We are going into the field of Government ownership and control. I think the time for that adventure, instead of the anxiety of war, is one of deliberation, when the Government has not the mighty and unavoidable problems on hand which it is called upon to meet now. If we can postpone the needless activities we need not be concerned about the war emergencies, because the Chief Executive of the United States of America, if he found our war activities for one moment hampered by a threatened strike, or by the operations under private control, could seize the wire lines of communication in this country in an instant and he would be justified in doing so, and he would be sustained by a nation-wide and deliberate public sentiment in the United States.

STIMULATION OF AGRICULTURE.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, I want to propose, and do propose, the following unanimous-consent agreement. All Senators are more or less familiar with the reason and the object of it. I should like to have it read so that we may consider it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCKELLAR in the chair). The Secretary will read the proposed agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 11945) entitled, "An act to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, the purposes of the act entitled 'An act to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products,'" shall continue the unfinished business of the Senate, and on and after August 26 it shall be considered to the exclusion of all other business (except that it may be temporarily laid aside by unanimous consent) until passed or defeated on a vote taken on the question of its passage.

Mr. PENROSE. This unanimous-consent agreement refers only to the amendment to the Agricultural bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. It does.

Mr. PENROSE. It does not refer to the whole bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It refers to the bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. This is a supplementary Agricultural bill, and, as a matter of course, the real point was the amendment which is now pending, and it would apply to that if we agree to this unanimous consent.

Mr. REED and Mr. MCCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I simply want to say that I am not going to object to this agreement, but I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that in a time of war, when anything is liable to happen, anything within the imagination, for any man to insist upon absolutely tying public business so that his particular pet measure must be considered to the exclusion of any other business, however important, is taking a very grave responsibility on himself. I have not the slightest doubt that the proponents of this particular amendment, that has provoked all of this controversy, would insist on passing it if the determination of a battle in France depended upon it.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, before agreeing to this unanimous consent, I want to ask the Senator from South Carolina whether we are going to have a vote upon either of the agricultural measures—the vetoed measure or the supplemental measure? We ought to have one of them disposed of before the recess is begun. The general Agricultural bill, which was vetoed, has, I understand, since been passed by the House. I should like to know whether or not it is to be brought up and disposed of in the Senate before the contemplated recess.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have not charge of either of those bills, and can not speak specially; but the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture is present, and I presume he can state whether or not a vote will be had. I think there has been passed a resolution continuing the appropriations for such bills as will not be passed in case we do take a recess or an adjournment from day to day.

Mr. MCCUMBER. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture is here, and undoubtedly he can inform the Senate whether we will have before us that bill for final disposition.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it is manifestly not the purpose of the Senate to pass at this time the special Agricultural appropriation bill, which is the one involved in the proposition in the unanimous-consent agreement. It goes over until August 26. I assume if the House has not passed the regular bill it will undoubtedly pass it at an early hour and will dispatch it to the Senate. I have not reached a definite conclusion as to what action I will ask the Senate to take. I intend to confer with a number of Senators before reaching a decision; but a continuing resolution has just been passed making provision for the Department of Agriculture for July and August. Still, it may be possible and it may be desirable to pass the regular appropriation bill.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I have been informed that the regular Agricultural appropriation bill, which was vetoed, has been passed again by the House, omitting the portion for which the veto was given.

Mr. GORE. That was the program, I know; but I have not been advised that the bill has already passed.

Mr. MCCUMBER. That is my information.

Mr. GORE. I had not been advised that a vote was taken.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I may be in error.

Mr. GORE. I understood the House was to have an extended debate before taking a vote on the final passage of the bill excluding the wheat amendment. Whether any action has been taken on it, I am unable to say.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I shall not at this time object to the unanimous-consent agreement if we can get it right away.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I simply desire to state I shall not object to the unanimous-consent agreement proposed. I recognize that perhaps at the present time the friends of the bill referred to in the agreement have a majority in the Senate to proceed this afternoon or on Monday with the measure, and in order to facilitate the public business and accommodate the desires of many Senators who wish a little interval in our legislative activities, I shall not object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate agree to the unanimous-consent agreement? Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. REED. Can that be done without a roll call?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that it does not require a roll call under subsection 3 of Rule XII, which provides for a roll call when the agreement is for a final vote on a specified date. This unanimous-consent agreement does not provide for a vote on a specified date but merely states that the bill shall continue the unfinished business of the Senate on and after August 26 and it shall be considered.

Mr. REED. I had not heard that part of it read.

Mr. HALE and Mr. McCUMBER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Do I understand this matter has been settled?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has been settled.

TELEGRAPH AND TELEPHONE CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I shall take only three or four minutes of the time of the Senate. At the risk of taking up a matter which has already been discussed I make one last appeal to the chairman of the committee to enlighten the Senate as to the military necessity for this measure. I can not conceive how the chairman can so earnestly advocate the resolution himself unless he has some information in his possession which the rest of us have not.

As far as I am personally concerned, unless some military necessity can be shown, the principles that are involved in the measure I can not favor. I am not seeking to harass the chairman. I am seeking light to determine what my vote shall be on this question. If any military necessity can be shown, if in any way it can be shown that the joint resolution is necessary in carrying on the war, I shall cheerfully vote for it. I want to stand by the President in every measure necessary to carry on the war. If no such proof can be shown I can not vote for the joint resolution.

I have had occasion to make a canvass of this side of the Chamber on this bill. I am not in any way authorized to speak for the minority in the Senate, but I think I am at liberty to tell the Senator that there are very many Senators on this side of the Chamber who feel as I do about the measure, and that if a military necessity can be shown, a very large number of votes on this side of the Chamber will be cast for the resolution. I do not know that these votes are necessary to pass the joint resolution. I do not know that the votes are desired; but I do say that we are entitled to some enlightenment on this question before we do vote.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. In reply to the query I will say I do not like altogether the expression "this side of the Chamber." There is but one side in this war. There is no side here touching the war. I am sure the Senator from Maine used the expression inadvertently.

Mr. HALE. No, Mr. President, I said this side of the Chamber, because I did not presume to make a canvass of the other side.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On a question of this kind, as the chairman of the committee, I have not hesitated to canvass the other side as well as this side on questions that seemed to me to be involved with the war.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit a suggestion?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. I want to say to the Senator most emphatically that the steam-roller methods and the absence of consideration given to this measure and the denial of information have done more to make a demarcation than anything which has occurred recently in this Chamber.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I was very much gratified in the committee at the action of the Republican Senators. It so happened that there were, if I may use that expression now, but two Republican members of the committee in the city.

Mr. PENROSE. The others were not even notified.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The others were notified, as is the usual rule, but were not telephoned for, nor was any effort made even by those——

Mr. PENROSE. On the contrary, many had left the town on the assurance of the chairman that hearings would be had.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The assurance of the acting chairman.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes; the official chairman for the time, and in accordance with the vote of the committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Addressing myself to the inquiry of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], I want to state that I took occasion to inquire why this joint resoluton was urged, and I was assured that it was the opinion of the administration, of the President, that there would very likely be a necessity for it. One of the reasons given was that with the telegraphs and telephones owned by different companies there had been some delay and some difficulty in the transmission of messages, which are numerous incident to the time of war; and it was desired, for the purpose of expediting communication, to bring them into harmony, so that telegrams would not have a preferential right on private interests, but in expedition of the public interests telegrams would be put immediately upon any line without regard to who owned it.

Mr. PENROSE. That is done now. The Government has priority now. The Senator forgot to use the word "coordinate," a very handy word.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I am simply making a statement in reply to the Senator from Maine. There were other reasons given, one of them being that the Government business would certainly be better safeguarded by having the Government in control, as has been pointed out here, on certain lines and in certain emergencies.

Mr. PENROSE. What kind of emergencies?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, there was this feature, and this feature is paramount so far as I am concerned. Everyone recognizes as the administration recognizes that the methods of communication are as vital as the methods of transportation. There is not a Senator on this floor who would deny the Government the right to take control of and to operate any means of communication if in the judgment of the administration it was essential to the prosecution of the war.

The proposed joint resolution simply states that in case the emergency in the judgment of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy arises, without having to come to Congress immediately he can exercise his power for the protection of the public interests. None of us can tell what may arise. None of us would dare stand in the way in case it did arise; and now that we are in the thick of the fight, as the Commander in Chief has asked us to enable him in case an emergency arises to use this power, it will be ample time for us, it seems to me, to begin to pass definite legislation as to the methods by which it shall be handled if it becomes apparent that the power that we intrust to him has been abused to the detriment of the people and perhaps to the detriment of our participation in the war. It simply states that in case in his judgment the emergency arises he may use this power.

As I was about to say a moment ago, so far from its being aggravating to me as an American citizen and an individual to see men jealous of granting this power, it is a matter of congratulation to me as an American citizen, that in spite of the talk about socialism, in spite of the talk about Government control of these utilities, every one of these grants of power in the time of this emergency has been scrutinized and has been rather reluctantly granted not because I believe in my heart we were unwilling to grant this power but because of the democratic habit that has been ours from time immemorial that these were personal and individual rights; but after sober thought, when they knew that upon the altar of our country had to be laid these peace-time privileges, we have gone to it heroically and nobly.

I have no criticism to make of any man who stands here and voices his protest against this concentration of power, but as it is now, in the kaleidoscopic changes that are taking place every day, none of us know what emergency may arise even in this country for the use of a private telephone or a public telephone or telegraph line or cable, and we will not deny the power to those who are on the watchtower and must be always ready and equipped to meet the emergency when it does arise. It is for that reason that I am going to vote for this grant of power. If it is misused, the responsibility will be upon those to whom we grant it. The times are extraordinary, and if you and I had all the hearings that were possible, if we had summoned every interested party and heard their views, there is not a Senator on the floor who would have entertained the idea of putting private interests against the public welfare in this hour of our trial. There is not a man who would weigh the investments of the Western Union Telegraph Co. against the investment of the rights and the lives and prosperity of the American people. There is not a man here who would weigh the private interests and the private convenience of the American people in the balance against obtaining a victory over those who would destroy our Government. If all the interested parties had come before us and said this restriction ought to be placed, that amount of money ought to be safeguarded, they would have been brushed aside by every man in this Chamber and told if the emergency calls for it you are not to be considered; it is the safety of the American people and free institutions that are at stake now and not dollars and cents and private convenience.

For that reason I am going to say to the administration, "I grant you the power as a patriot, as a lover of my country, with pride in it, and upon you rests the responsibility of its wise use."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in other words the Senator has no further information than the rest of us on this subject. If I were chairman of a great committee and were given a great question such as this to handle and were not furnished with any greater amount of ammunition than the chairman appears to have, I should feel that I had been very badly equipped indeed.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, just one word in reply to that. When those whom we have charged with the active prosecution of this war, upon whose word and whose acts hang the destiny of the American people, whom we clothe with the highest power in the gift of the American people, tell me solemnly that this power is desired in order to meet any emergency that may arise, when I am cognizant of the fact that the means of communication are as essential to the proper prosecution of the war as money and transportation, I am not going to ask any further reason than to say, "I grant you the power, because I recognize that it may become essential to the prosecution of the war, if it is not essential now, and you shall not be embarrassed by not having the power to avail yourself of it when the emergency does arise."

Mr. REED. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator understand and believe that this power would be exercised almost immediately without waiting for any new occurrence or any new emergency?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not. I do not think it will be used unless in some particulars somewhere the President thinks the public business might be benefited.

Mr. REED. The Senator is now talking about public business. A moment ago he was talking about military necessity.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. That is what I meant to cover.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator undertake to assure the Senate it is his understanding that the power granted in this bill will not be exercised until some great emergency shall arise of a military nature?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I have no information along that line at all. I will say frankly that I do not know just what action the administration will take; but I do know that the contract between us expressed in this bill is if the emergency demands it, if the condition of America in the war demands it. If they want to violate that contract, it is up to them. I say, the solemn contract entered into between us and those whom we have to administer this law is "whenever the President shall deem it necessary for the national security and defense." That is the contract.

Mr. REED. Yes; but, Mr. President, that contract, as the Senator well knows, could be readily and honestly construed to mean that if at this moment or to-morrow the President thinks the taking over of these properties is necessary to the security or defense he could take them over and would take them over without any real emergency arising.

Now, I want to occupy just one moment. When I cast my vote upon this bill I do not intend to do it with my eyes closed to the fact that there has been no attempt by the committee to ascertain the reasons back of this bill, and although the Senate practically, although not technically, sent the bill back to the committee for investigation, an investigation was denied. Motions were made in the committee to request members of the Cabinet to appear and furnish information as to the reasons for this bill. Those motions were denied. Motions were made to call for information from other sources and those motions were denied. When I find that a man will not permit an investigation to be made I always know it is because he fears the investigation. I never saw a man in my life run away from an investigation when he was certain it was going to result in a satisfactory manner to him.

The reason for this action was that the committee preferred to stand upon the bald doctrine that whatever the President asks ought to be granted. I have heard the effort made to extort with a verbal corkscrew from the chairman of the committee and different members of the committee a direct answer with reference to what this bill means and under what circumstances and conditions it will be employed. I have never found anybody shrewd enough or keen enough to extract a direct answer. It was first intimated that there was going to be a strike, but the strike turned out to be a matter of imagination. We were then told that information would be leaking out or that information might at some future time leak out; that some other thing might happen in the future; but when Senators have asked whether anything of that kind has occurred, it seems to be now conceded that, under the present management and control, no difficulties have arisen in the way of information leaking out. So we get back to the proposition——

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I thought I was speaking in my own right.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I had the floor.

Mr. REED. The Senator had yielded.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I merely want to make this statement, and then I will, for the present, let my case rest on that.

In reference to the committee dodging the issue——

Mr. REED. I do not want to inject that into the middle of my remarks. I wish the Senator from South Carolina would wait until I conclude. I shall be very brief.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Very well.

Mr. REED. So when we get down to the last analysis of this measure the committee say this joint resolution is desired as a war measure; it must be passed as a war measure; and it must be passed upon faith and not upon facts. They intimate to us, however, that the joint resolution will not be invoked or the powers conferred by it used until or unless some new emergency arising in the future shall come upon us.

Mr. President, I have no quarrel with those gentlemen who propose to pass this joint resolution before the President has asked it. I am going to ask to amend the joint resolution; and if I can get it amended, well and good; but if I can not, I may vote for the joint resolution anyway. I am, however, going to vote for it with my eyes open and with a full certainty—at least to my own satisfaction—that, without waiting for any new emergency to arise, the powers under this joint resolution will be exercised; the telephone and telegraph lines will be taken over; and when they are taken over there will begin the process of the scrambling together of the eggs—if I may employ the metaphor of another—just as to-day the railroad management has so intermixed the business of the railroads that I do not believe it can ever be unscrambled.

So I think, in the first instance, the telephone and telegraph business will in like manner be intermixed and scrambled so that it will with difficulty, and perhaps under no circumstances can it, ever be unscrambled. I will hazard the guess that within 90 days from this time the telegraph and telephone offices and the railroad offices will all be found to a large extent in the same building and under one common and general management, or, at least, there will be an alliance of management that will be very close. So, at the end of a few months' or a few years' time, when this war is over, we shall have a system of railroads that will be practically one system, and as a part of that system of transportation will be the telephone and the telegraph, all under governmental control and management. The final result will be, in my opinion, that these utilities will never go back to their present owners; that when we vote for the joint resolution to-day we are voting for the acquisition and control of these lines for all time.

I am not fooling myself a bit about it. I really think that the only redeeming feature there is about the whole business is that out of it all there may come in the end a complete control of public utilities by the public. What I regret is—and I most seriously regret it—that, instead of taking these utilities over one at a time and gradually absorbing them and placing them in charge of some independent tribunal as far removed from politics as possible, we are taking them over in the lump, and we are about to throw them into the hands of officers who, however patriotic they may be at this time, will at some time in the future have other interests than the winning of the war. They will have the interest of perpetuating their party in power, and these great instrumentalities may become great political agencies. That hour may come, not when Mr. McAdoo and Mr. Burleson are holding these offices, not when the Democratic Party is in control, but it may come when some other party and when some other men are in control, and it may be the occasion of profound regret to us that these great instrumentalities have been taken over in this haphazard way and placed in the hands of men who hold mere political positions.

That is the regret I feel; but I say that, in my humble judgment, there is no use of our trying to fool ourselves at all. We have taken over the railroads and taken them over for all time. They will never go back to the ownership that controlled them when the Government laid its hand upon them. We are now taking over the telephones and the telegraphs by this joint resolution; and when they have been taken over, whether you call it a lease or by whatsoever name you call it, it will be a permanent taking and, in my opinion, a permanent holding.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. If the Senator from Missouri is elaborating the seriousness of this great question, I want to ask him if he does not think that the Federal example will extend to municipal ownership throughout the country of the various utilities in the cities of this land?

Mr. REED. I have not any doubt that there will be more or less of that. There has been a great deal of it, at least as applied to certain municipal utilities, and it has been found a very great success.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] having received such a clear, lucid, and definite reply to his query, I assume he is entirely satisfied now as to what course he will pursue. I have some views which I can express in a very few moments upon this subject; but I should like to know on what particular feature of the joint resolution they should be directed. I therefore ask the Chair to inform me what is the pending amendemnt?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is that of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] to strike out the word "telephone."

Mr. McCUMBER. I will direct my remarks to that amendment, for the reason that I shall have occasion to speak on another subject, upon the merits of the joint resolution itself, before the final vote.

Mr. President, I feel that it is due, at least to myself—although I do not for a moment suspect that any proposition I may make or that anyone else may make at this time will have the slightest effect upon the final vote—I feel that I ought to give a few reasons why I find it impossible now to cast my vote in favor of this general proposition. If to-morrow some reason should be given me by the President or by the committee having charge of the joint resolution why it is necessary, I should have no hesitancy in changing my vote; but to-day, with practically no information upon the subject, and at least with no evidence bearing upon the matter presented by the committee, I can not find my way clear to vote for this resolution.

Mr. President, when we entered the war and the President of the United States believed that it was necessary to take over the railways of the country as a war measure, he had no hesitancy whatever in sending to Congress a message upon the subject, in fact in delivering that message to Congress in person. He gave his reasons clearly and explicitly why he desired the control of the railways for war purposes. The matter was taken in hand in this body and investigated by the proper committee of the Senate, reported after a committee investigation, and after a full discussion it was voted upon by the Senate.

When, again, the President of the United States believed that it was necessary to control the prices of food products in the United States and to control the sales of food and munitions and their manufacture, he had no hesitancy whatever in presenting his views to the Congress of the United States, asking the Congress to investigate the subject, and after a full and free investigation upon the particular subject and after full debate by both branches of Congress, we acted upon his suggestion and placed these things under Government control.

Mr. President, if I now believed that it was necessary, in order to maintain the national security or defense, to take over the telegraph and telephone lines of the country, I should be guilty of little less than treason if I failed to place those instrumentalities of communication in the hands of the Government. I will go further, Mr. President, and say that, if I believed there was a reasonable probability that the Government might be injured in any way by withholding that control, I could not square my adverse vote with a sense of patriotism and loyalty to the country.

But knowing, Mr. President, the inexperience of the Government in the operation of any line of business, knowing how strikingly inefficient and how grossly extravagant in all cases have been our Government operations, I think that I am entitled to know wherein the necessity for Government operation of these lines of communication arises; and, in all sincerity, I ask some one to give me that information.

The very fact that the power to operate these lines must come through congressional action presupposes that the Members of the House and the Members of the Senate will exercise their legislative judgment upon that particular subject.

The Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], in introducing the discussion, said that he knows of no reason and he can at present conceive of no contingency which might necessitate Government operation, but he tells us that the President thinks that there may arise such a possibility and therefore he is ready and willing to abdicate the authority of Congress, to escape responsibility, and to delegate the power. He says, in effect, "Let us exercise no judgment; let us pass this joint resolution with our eyes closed." The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] not only voices the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Alabama in this respect, but he goes further and, in effect, says, "I close the windows of my own mind so that not a single ray of information on the subject shall penetrate, and now, being in darkness myself, I must leave the matter to the judgment of the President of the United States, who alone has the light of information."

Mr. President, I can not square that view with my understanding of the duty and the functions of Congress. Heaven knows that I want to do everything that is necessary to win this war, and not only that, but I want to do everything that may in any degree assist in winning the war. If it can be pointed out to me in any way that this will assist, that there is any possibility of its assisting in the prosecution of the war, I certainly will change my own conviction at the present time and vote in favor of it.

It is said the President wants authority to take possession and to control and operate these lines in case he finds at any future time that it is necessary so to do, and that he will not act until that occasion arises; but the President of the United States has not stated that to me; he has not stated that to any Member of Congress. The most that can be said is that the Postmaster General, who has always been predisposed toward Government ownership, has, seeing the possibility of a strike, thought it an opportune time to put these lines of communication into the possession of the Government, but immediately that fear has been dissipated by the telegrams and communications we have received from employees of the company all over the United States declaring positively that they will not strike.

Therefore, the only reason suggested for present action has been the fear of a possible strike which might tie up business; and I assume that when the President approved of what was stated in the letter of the Postmaster General, he necessarily was actuated by the same apprehension. With the disappearance of the strike fear must disappear the only reason for Government operation.

Mr. President, if the President should say to me, "I think I should have the power to act when I deem it necessary," I know the President as a broad-gauge, patriotic American citizen, recognizing the rights and authority of Congress over a subject of this kind, would expect me to ask him, "Why is it necessary?". And I know that the President would not answer me in the evasive manner by saying that he wished it for the national security and defense. If he made that statement, he naturally would expect me, in order to enable me to exercise my own judgment upon the matter, to ask him, "Wherein is the danger? Where does it lie? What is the occasion which demands a transfer of these lines to the Government at this time? Wherein is our national security and defense threatened?"

I would ask what the contingency was; and I believe, if the President thought that there was a contingency such as he foresaw when he sent in his message relative to the railway bill and the food-control bill, that he would be equally frank with the people of the United States and the Congress and would tell them what the exigency was.

I appreciate that, as Commander in Chief, the President of the United States would have the right within a war zone to take possession of any and all properties that might be necessary to effectuate his war purposes; and he could do that without the authority of Congress; but I question the legal declarations that have been made on this side of the Chamber that the President can, whenever he sees fit, without any immediate danger, take possession of all of the lines of transportation or that he can take possession of all other lines of communication.

Within the war zone his power would be complete; and if this great battle were being waged in the United States, between the Atlantic and the Pacific Oceans, as it is being waged to-day between the Gulf of Finland and the Mediterranean Sea, there would be no question that the telegraph and telephone systems would be so interlinked with the necessities of war that the President would have ample authority to take possession of them. But we are on a continent by ourselves; we are from three to six thousand miles away from the seat of war. Every communication that leaves this country can be censored to-day. The President of the United States and the Government of the United States could have no more control over the cables that are leased by American citizens and American companies than the companies themselves now exercise, and the Government could not by any possibility control the other end of the cable; but to-day the Government can, and does, censor every message that passes outside of the United States.

Mr. President, I am averse, I will admit, to Government ownership or operation of any line of activity that private ownership or private operation could properly conduct. My own observation and experience are that it costs the Government from one and one-half to three times as much to do anything it has ever attempted to do than it costs the private individual to produce the same results.

But the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]—and his suggestion is reiterated by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]—asks, Why should we balk at turning over these telegraph and telephone lines to the Government when we have just turned over our railways to the Government? Why, Mr. President, when we turned over the railways we had the evidence of the necessity for so doing before us. We knew at that time that the financial conditions of the several railways of the country were such that in the face of the demands of the Government for money they could not raise the funds to maintain their several lines in a condition to take care of the Government business.

We also knew at that time that the facilities of the several lines were not sufficient to take care of the Government's business, and we knew, thirdly, Mr. President, that we must have the prior right of way over every line of railway in the United States. We knew that the Government ought and must have the right to say, "We will give preference to munitions of war over an order to ship pianos"; we knew and understood that the Government must have the right to say, "We will take possession of every passenger coach for the purpose of transferring our soldiers to the exclusion of the more remunerative transfer of the ordinary passenger." So we acted upon our judgment; we exercised a legislative judgment upon the subject.

So, Mr. President, with reference to the food-control bill, we knew that our allies were crying for food; that evidence was clearly before us; we knew what the supply of food in the United States was; we knew the facilities for transporting those foods both to our own people and to our allies. That was all discussed, all brought out, and we exercised our legislative judgment in declaring that the Government should have control of handling and sale of food products. We may have made a mistake; I am not saying that we did not, but we acted upon our judgment, and we passed the measures upon our legislative judgment. Why are we denied in this particular instance any evidential fact upon which we can base such judgment?

Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois suggested one danger that might arise under the private control of our telegraph lines. He said that code messages and ordinary messages which appear to be very innocent may go over the lines into Mexico and elsewhere, but that if the Government knew their meaning it would know that they were intended to be used in giving information against the Government itself, and he instanced that there might be sent over the lines a message asking about the price of buttermilk in Mexico or to what point it could be shipped, and that that little innocent appearing message might have a significance to the receiver that would enable him to jeopardize the interests of this great Government.

But, Mr. President, has the Senator stopped to think and to consider the comparative amount of information that goes secretly, day after day, through the mails of the country? Why, where there is one message sent by wire, which is recorded at both ends of the line and subject to public inspection, there are 10,000 letters which no one sees and no one has any understanding of their contents but the sender and the receiver; and yet we are not censoring throughout the United States all of these letters. Why, Mr. President, if we did, I am afraid half of our population would have to be converted into censors; and yet the mail is in the hands of the Government.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Going back to the Senator's illustration of messages being sent in code—that is, a message inquiring about buttermilk, or something of that sort—suppose that the Government were to take charge of the telegraph lines to-day, how would it prevent the sending of messages which are so innocent that they can be sent to-day without causing the slightest suspicion unless, indeed, the Government stops all messages until they have been thoroughly explained and until they have run down both the sender and the receiver, in which event we might as well do away with the telegraph altogether?

Mr. McCUMBER. Ask the Senator from Illinois; he makes the suggestion.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois made another statement which was rather startling to me. He said: "Why have hearings for a contingency that may never arise?" I might have innocently asked the Senator: "Why pass a joint resolution for a contingency that may never arise?" If there is any occasion for the passage of the joint resolution, certainly there must be an occasion for a hearing upon it; and yet the Senator from Illinois would not have us pass any judgment whatever upon this measure. Why, he says, or some other Senator upon that side says, that the fact that we ask for investigation, the fact that we discuss bills and joint resolutions, why we think they ought to be amended, is disheartening to our soldiers across the ocean. He cited as one of these disheartening facts the discussion upon increasing the draft age. There were Senators here who believed that we ought to put 5,000,000 men in France just as rapidly as it was possible for us to raise and equip them, and that in order to increase the number we ought to increase the number from which they could be drawn. Would it be disheartening to our soldiers in France to tell them that the Government intends to back them up 5,000,000 strong? I think if there was anything disheartening it was the vote of the Senate which failed to indicate to our soldiers that they would have that backing and would have it now, or as soon as possible.

Mr. President, I repeat, I believe that if the President of the United States foresaw a contingency that was dangerous to the Government he would have enlightened Congress upon that subject; and without that information I shall vote against this joint resolution.

But it was suggested by the Senator from Illinois, in the very strong speech that was made yesterday, that there might be recondite, secret, deep reasons which the President of the United States could not safely disclose to the public. He had in his mind a magazine of powder under our body politic which was in danger of being exploded by a spark of information. Mr. President, I do not know how to designate an argument of that kind. To my mind it is ridiculous. There is no such mighty danger. There is nothing that the President of the United States could not frankly tell Congress; and when he does tell us and demonstrates to us that this joint resolution is needed, that he needs the control of the telegraph lines and the telephone lines of the country, I, for one, shall be very willing to change my vote and give it to him, for Heaven knows we want to help him win this war in every possible way.

But, Mr. President, while I can see no reason for turning over this property to the Government at the present time, I can see a danger in so doing, and I will be frank to say what that danger is.

To-day, Mr. President, the employees of these companies, as a rule, are entirely satisfied. They are being treated well. Their wages are good. They are loyal to their companies, and loyal to the Government, and they say, "We are satisfied with conditions. We do not want them to be interfered with. We have contracts with our companies, whereby we are insured for life after a given length of service. We do not know to what extent those contracts may be modified under Government operation. Now, being satisfied, we are not asking for this change." I say, as a rule, that is the attitude of the employees; but there are always employees who would like to increase their wages, and they would like to do it whether it is just or unjust.

We had what was called a threatened strike in 1916; and to meet that threatened strike of employees on the railway lines we passed a bill, known as the Adamson bill, in which we increased the wages of all of those engaged in direct transportation of the cars or rolling stock, of freight and passengers. To my mind, there would have been no strike at that time. Those people, who were then receiving from $4.50 for a very few hours of work to $12 a day, were satisfied. You could not have gotten the majority of them to desert their companies; but there were a few noisy, discontented persons, and they demanded greater wages, and the Government immediately responded, and voted them, as I remember, 25 per cent increase.

Mr. President, that added enormously to the cost of freight, which goes directly into the cost of living; and immediately the railways demanded higher rates. The higher rates were granted. Then, again, we took possession of the railways; and the moment we took control we gave another advance all along the line of 25 per cent, when it was not even demanded. What did that mean? It meant $340,000,000 that must be raised by taxation, and that sum must be paid again by the people of the country to one class of its people.

Now, Mr. President, we are already carrying mighty heavy burdens. We are talking about 5,000,000 men in France. Do you appreciate the fact that it will cost us $35,000,000,000 a year to support 5,000,000 men there and keep the line up to that strength? And if we raise it in accordance with what some of the very best generals in our Army say that it ought to be raised to—5,000,000 men in France and 2,500,000 men back of them, noncombatants, and another 2,500,000 to 3,000,000 men in training in the United States—the total will amount to at least $50,000,000,000 a year. Where are you going to get the money to do it? No matter how patriotic we may be, there is a limit to our credit and a limit to our ability to raise money.

What will be done when we secure possession of these telegraph lines? I will tell you what will be done. You will not have this matter under Government control 30 days before there will be a demand for a raise of wages. The Government will respond to that demand, and we will have another half billion dollars that must be raised, in addition to the enormous expenses we are shouldering in order to maintain this war. Every time you increase your wages along all these lines of Government activity you again increase the cost of living, and that necessarily creates a second demand for an increased wage; and so we will go on jack-screwing wages and living costs upward and upward until God only knows where we will finally land.

So I believe Government control, with its added expenses, will be a real injury to the Government of the United States; but, notwithstanding that, if the President of the United States will tell me, or tell Congress, that this is necessary, and why it is necessary, he will have my vote, as I know he will have the vote of every Member of the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I fear that the last suggestion made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] will not be realized. The time has come when Senators are not supposed to know; and the history of this joint resolution, if I may say so, is a perfect indication, according to my judgment, of the truth of that assertion. The message comes by indirection. It is that such and such a piece of legislation is required. The reasons may be given, or they may not be given. In this case I am in entire sympathy with the contention made by the Senator from North Dakota to the effect that the reasons have not been given.

I have listened to nearly all of the debate that has occurred here, including the answer of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the question put to him by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. As a matter of fact, it is fair to say—and I say it with no unkind thought for any of my colleagues or anybody in the administration—that the lack of knowledge on this question in governmental circles and in legislative circles is complete. The only information, I think, that has been given to the Senate that was at all comprehensive, or approached being comprehensive, was that given in the address of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who really endeavored to tell the Senate something about the organization and management of the telegraph and telephone companies. None of the proponents of this measure have attempted to say what those companies consist of, how great their business is, how they are managed, nor in any detail what kind of service they render to the public; nor have any of the Senators who support this joint resolution as yet informed the Senate how the Government can run these lines better than the companies that are now running them. But, as I say, we are not supposed to know. It is not the only matter that has come before the Senate in recent months in which the Senate has been without information.

We had a debate here this morning, shortly after our convening, in which some Senators discussed the great crisis now existing in Russia. Some suggestions were made as to what America might do to help in the Russian situation, and incidentally, by so helping, help ourselves; but it turns out that no Member of the Senate has the slightest idea as to what the intentions of this Government are with respect to Russia. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] was asked if he knew what the policy of our Government was in that respect; and while it took him some time to make the reply, it might have been concentrated into one sentence, "I do not know."

I have searched through the hearings held upon this bill in the House of Representatives. They were very brief; they contained the testimony of only three Cabinet officers; and I thought that perhaps from at least one of them we might find out something concerning this great problem. One of them, Secretary Baker, was asked by a member of the committee some questions, to ascertain, I assume, the size of this problem which it is now proposed that the Government shall take over; and perhaps it is fitting that I should read three or four of those questions and the answers. They will be found upon page 7 of the hearings. He was asked the following questions:

Mr. HAMILTON. Do you know how many miles of telegraph wire there are in the United States?
Secretary BAKER. I do not.
Mr. HAMILTON. In a general way, by what companies are these telegraph wires owned and controlled?
Secretary BAKER. I do not know that.
Mr. HAMILTON. Under existing law what power has the Government of control over messages and over the use of telegraph lines now?
Secretary BAKER. I can not answer that. I have not examined those laws, sir.
Mr. HAMILTON. Do you know anything about radio systems? They are referred to in this bill—that is, the names of the companies.
Secretary BAKER. No; only in a very general way.
Mr. HAMILTON. You don't know how many companies there are?
Secretary BAKER. I do not.

The questions and answers that I have just read are not read by me for the purpose of reflecting upon the Secretary of War; I read them in order to illustrate not only his ignorance but the ignorance of the Senate. With the possible exception of two or three Senators who perhaps by accident have known something of the operation and management of telegraph and telephone companies in the United States, this body is in complete ignorance of the entire problem, and I hasten to say that I am not one of those two or three Senators who know anything about it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to ask the Senator if the other two Cabinet officials were as full of information as the Secretary of War? [Laughter.]

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have examined their testimony, and I find that they are bursting with the same ignorance from which the Secretary of War is suffering. They offer no suggestions whatever of practical value to guide either House of Congress in the consideration of this legislation. In fact, the Secretary of War apparently agreed, and I assume that his two colleagues agree, with the proposal that it is not worth the consideration of the Senate; that we are not required to know anything about it; that it is of no use on earth for Senators to inform themselves; for he says, upon page 14, in reply to a series of questions which led up to this final answer, as I read it:

Everybody ought to have a hearing, but I do not see any reason for hearings on this. Nobody ought to be denied a hearing whenever the committee is sitting and they want to be heard, but I do not see how the owners of the property could add anything to the committee's information about it.

Mr. President, I do not oppose this joint resolution on the theory that the owners of the property and their interests should be balanced and weighed against the people of the United States and their interests; but if there is anybody in this country that knows something about these properties and can give some information to the Congress or one of its committees it is the owners; and those are the very people that the Secretary of War said ought not to be heard.

There is a mystery surrounding the genesis of this joint resolution and its conduct thus far through its parliamentary stages in the two Houses. No man in either House, so far as I have studied the RECORD, has been able to point out the emergency now confronting the country which would make the taking over of these utilities necessary, nor the emergency which might confront the country in the future. Perhaps that is one of the reasons, and the chief reason, why it is not necessary, in the minds of those who are behind the joint resolution, to have any hearings, for it is entirely probable that any extensive inquiry into this situation would develop the fact that there is no emergency, and that there probably never will be any emergency. Some of us who have felt in doubt upon this joint resolution as a matter of general principle have listened with a good deal of interest during this debate to the suggestions made by certain Senators who support it that it will not by its provisions result in the taking over of the companies unless some emergency arises in the future, while other Senators who support the joint resolution tacitly admit that by its passage the companies will be almost immediately taken over. Where the truth lies no Senator seems to know, and all methods and means of getting information have been shut off or denied.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] some time ago stated it as his solemn belief that the railroad companies never would be returned to their owners. Under certain political contingencies, I agree with him in that statement, for I am coming more and more to the belief—a belief derived from observation of men and events at the present time—that there are men in high places in the Government to-day who are determined that the railroads shall be so managed while this war is going on, and the lines of political endeavor and operation shall be so laid, that, if they have their way, the roads will not go back to the owners; and I have not the slightest doubt that the men who adhere to that school of thought have exactly the same intention with respect to the telegraph and telephone companies.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from New York has been reading the House hearings on that subject?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have.

Mr. HARDING. He is familiar with the testimony of the Cabinet officers on that subject, is he not?

Mr. WADSWORTH. If I am not greatly mistaken, the three Cabinet officers who appeared before the House committee are avowed advocates of Government ownership and operation, and they say there is no use of having any hearings about it; that is all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, who are these other two Cabinet officials?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Secretary Daniels and Postmaster General Burleson. The Postmaster General, as the Senator knows, for at least five years, long before we went into this war, insisted in his annual reports that the telegraph and telephone companies should be taken over as a permanent policy of the Government. Now, in view of the fact that the Senate has no information—and I say that advisedly—which would even tend to show that an emergency exists or that an emergency may arise in the near future which would make it a military necessity to take over these companies, I contend that the only force back of this proposition is that it is a proper Government policy in time of peace as well as in time of war; and that is the real object, in my humble judgment, although it is not the object of most of the Senators who support it.

I am inclined to agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], who stated a short time ago, not only with respect to the railroads but also with respect to the telegraph and telephone companies, that if this joint resolution passes the companies will never be returned to their present-day owners.

It is not a pleasant thing, Mr. President, to oppose any measure which is labeled a war measure. If I were confident of the genuineness of the label upon this joint resolution I would support the resolution.

Mr. HARDING. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HARDING. The Senator from New York is a member of the Military Affairs Committee having to do directly with war problems. I wish to ask him if the matter of the control of the telegraph and telephones has ever been brought to the attention of the committee as a matter of emergency.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not attended every session of that committee, but I think I am safe in saying that this subject has never been brought to the Military Committee in any shape or manner. No military officer ever has been before that committee; no civilian officer of the Government, whether it be of the War Department, the War Industries Board, or the Council of National Defense, who has suggested that our military operations were being handicapped through a lack of control on the part of the Government over the wire communications of this country.

Mr. HARDING. May I ask the Senator another question right there?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. HARDING. Is not the Senator aware of the fact that many of our industrial activities connected with the war have been hampered by the inefficiency of the Postal Service in the hands of the Government?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a matter of common public knowledge. The threat of the strike proved to be vague and indefinite, and finally had to be abandoned. So it can not be contended that even the Western Union Co. is threatened with a tie-up. No necessity has yet been proved in this House or in the other for the passage of this joint resolution. No emergency has been shown.

We come down to a consideration of what this resolution means as a matter of governmental policy in time of war, to be sure, when, of course, things are somewhat abnormal and we are willing to do anything to make the Government effective, and to a consideration of the effect of the governmental operations of these great utilities upon the public of the United States in time of peace.

Comment has been made, and I shall not repeat it, as to the effect of the governmental operation of the railroads. I do not think it inaccurate to say, Mr. President, that while many of the acts of the railway directorate may have been necessary, most of their acts are nevertheless somewhat unpopular in the United States. I have not given sufficient study to the railway question to determine with any degree of accuracy whether or not it was necessary to raise the railway rates to the extent they have been raised—both freight rates and passenger rates. I have no means of knowing, with my limited study of the subject, whether it is absolutely necessary for the railway directorate to embark upon the abandoning of railway stations, of eliminating from railway communication little country stations all over the United States, around which communities of Americans live and upon which those communities are dependent. It may be necessary in the interest of economy to abandon some or many of those stations. I have my doubts as to some of them. I am beginning to believe that the railway directorate is determined to show a profit in the operation of the railroads if it is humanly possible to do it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will observe that there has been a net decrease in seven months of $105,000,000 in a report published in the Railway Age a few days ago. I have not had access to the report made to the Interstate Commerce Commission, but for that short time I quote from the Railway Journal in that particular.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I remember seeing figures to that effect. My recollection goes further in that direction, and I am compelled to observe, as I remember it, that the deficit of the railroads was mostly incurred in the winter months, and that since these different policies have been put into effect, and perhaps due also to more favorable weather conditions, the railroads under Government management have commenced to pick up, and at the present rate of traffic and the present rate of the charges, passenger and freight, it is expected by the railway directorate that there will be a most substantial profit to go into the Treasury of the United States. But, of course, we pay for it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator will further notice that the department headed by the Director of Railways is now to make contracts. In fact, none of the contracts provided in the act lately passed by Congress for the taking of the roads have been signed; but now, even before those contracts are signed, there is a very decided effort on the part of the Government to make the railroads pay out of their fixed compensation for the improvements as well as for certain equipment of the roads, so that the Government will be relieved from meeting out of the gross earning power of the roads these necessary expenditures to keep the roads in order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The observations of the Senator from Illinois are interesting and important. I confess I am not informed upon that point.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHELAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator spoke casually of the increase in freight and passenger rates. Can he state what has been the actual increase in passenger and freight rates, thus enabling the present administration of the railroads to make an apparent profit but at the same time taxing the American people to the extent of probably $100,000,000 in order to do that?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think those figures have already been alluded to or given in debate on this very resolution. I confess to the Senator from West Virginia that I do not know the exact degree of raise in rates that has taken place in passenger or freight rates. I know they have been very considerable. That I encounter when I go to a ticket office myself. If it is necessary to impose that extra tax—for that is what it is, Senators, taxation upon the American people—in order to keep the railroads in a proper condition to handle the business of the country, and in particular the military business, well and good. That is, if it is. But I am wondering if that is the only purpose back of the raise, and I am wondering if the same thing is going to happen in the telegraph and telephone businesses when they are taken over. For we might just as well admit here and now that when this resolution passes it means the taking over of these companies. I am not consoled at all with the suggestion that they are not going to be taken over unless some emergency arises in the future. There are three Cabinet officers who advocate their being taken over at once, and they are the only people who appeared for the administration. We might just as well make up our minds that within a month or six weeks after the passage of this resolution the Western Union and the Postal Telegraph will be taken over and steps will be inaugurated for the taking over of the Bell Telephone; and when they start taking over the trunk lines of the Bell Telephone System they have started upon a road which they can not forsake until they reach and take over the last little farmers' line out on the prairies. You can not stop halfway between. They are all connected up one with the other in the matter of service and of rates, through and local.

So I say with due deliberation, when this resolution passes, as I assume it is going to pass, you are going to have Government operation of telegraph and telephones. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] states that you will never have anything else after this war is over.

Mr. President, I can not follow that road. To me it means the eventual breaking down of our form of government. I can not believe that a representative democracy in which the people can truly and effectively rule can survive under a bureaucracy which must and will grow up under this policy of governmental ownership and operation of all public utilities.

I do not believe that a representative republic can survive in which a large proportion of the voters are hired and paid by the Government. The longer we keep away from a situation of that kind the longer will this Republic live. Never have my observations led me to believe that under such a system the public at large will be better served or live happier lives. Go where you will, Mr. President, all over this world, and you can not find a Government owned and operated railroad that compares with the railroads of the United States in their general average in efficiency.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Supposing the Senator's prediction should come true and the Government should take over the telegraph and telephone lines of the country during the war and the war should last, say, two years, would that space of time not be sufficient to demonstrate whether the taking over of the railroads, telegraphs, and telephones under public control and ownership is a good or a bad thing, and does the Senator think that if it proves as bad as he predicts the country would make it permanent?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I fear the power of a bureaucracy, once it has been established at the seat of Government. Of course, while the war is on the test, as the Senator from Nebraska terms it, would not and could not be an entirely reliable one, but in the period that is to follow the closing of the war this country is to be confronted, as all other countries are to be confronted, with problems of tremendous difficulty, of tremendous complexity; not this one alone, but new ones about which we have no idea to-day. What I fear is that when that time comes the minds of the people of this country will be solely directed toward the solution of great world problems for the proper solution of which we are battling; a very plausible cry will go up from the bureaucracy here in Washington—and I use that term advisedly; every Senator knows what I mean by the term "bureaucracy"—a plausible cry will go from that bureaucracy, "Let things stay as they have been during those war years with respect to governmental ownership and operation of utilities," and that will seem to be the easiest way in the view of many people. That is the period that I fear most, that period of reconstruction, that period in which we must restore our balance if we can possibly do it. And when I see a resolution brought in here for which there has been no reason given worthy of the name, in which the Senate is not informed in any degree whatsoever, nor the House of Representatives, in connection with which there has been shown to exist no emergency, nor has the character of the emergency in the future been described to us even in remote language—when I see such a resolution brought here with the simple request that it be passed, I think we are adding to the burdens of our Government not only during the war, but to the complexities that will confront our people after the war is over.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. REED. The Senator speaks of difficulties after the war. Of course we can not open the book of the future to tell what they may be, but that difficulties will exist I agree we may anticipate. It is possible that the war may work a solution of difficulties which will put war beyond the possibilities of the future. I say that is possible, but I do not believe it is probable, and I think it is the idlest dream that ever disturbed the fancy of a dreamer.

Now, with that premise I wanted to suggest this thought to the Senator: If at the end of this war we are confronted with the practical problem of preserving the life of our Nation by preserving its armies and its navies and its military power, and if during this war it has been found necessary as a war emergency to take over all of the facilities of the country, when the war is ended we are nevertheless obliged to maintain a military establishment for the future. Will not the fact that we did take over these facilities during the war be an almost unanswerable argument against returning them to private ownership because the cry would naturally be that if it were necessary to take them over during the war we ought to continue to hold them for military reasons? I think that is in accord with the argument the Senator has made and I think the argument well-nigh unanswerable, if this action to-day be sound.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no question about that. That will be one of the arguments, and perhaps the principal one, which will be held up to the American people at that time. The mere fact that it seemed necessary to do it during the time of war will be cited as proof positive that it is a better thing to keep on during time of peace, and people will have forgotten the circumstances surrounding the original embarkation of the Government upon this policy of governmental operation and governmental ownership.

I was about to say, Mr. President, and I shall close very shortly, that not only am I convinced that this tendency of ours to drift toward the socialistic state is a most dangerous one, one which, of course, we must tolerate in some degree in the framing of war measures in order that we shall consecrate our efforts in the waging of the war, but my conviction that the taking over of these companies would actually work against our Government and make its operations less efficient is equally strong.

To-day I think it fair to say that there is no audible complaint against the telephone and telegraph systems of the United States. The Government itself has no complaint against them. Search these hearings, and you can not find from the lips of any one of those three Cabinet officers any real criticism as to the way the business is being carried on. It is conceded that we have the best telegraph and telephone systems in the world. I think no one will deny it.

My conviction is that the instant the Government starts to operate these systems they will commence to go downhill in efficiency, unless, on the other hand, in order to cover up governmental inefficiency and produce the right kind of a balance sheet under governmental operation, the rates are raised for telephones and telegrams by the Government itself; in other words, I believe that when they are taken over, as they will be, we will pay more for governmental efficiency than we are now paying for the efficiency of the privately owned companies; and I contend that that will not help the United States in winning the war.

Mr. President, I did not expect to consume so much time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I desire to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat, or to make an observation as showing how these governmental agencies work in actual practice after we have given them the power. I have in my hand an order of the United States Fuel Administration, dated June 13, from which I quote the following:

> 2. That the Maryland State fuel administrator is hereby authorized to direct the resale and distribution of all coal requisitioned for or consigned or diverted to and received by him, under the provisions of any orders of the United States Fuel Administration, to and among such consumers and users of bituminous or anthracite coal, respectively, in the State of Maryland as in his judgment may from time to time be in need thereof and occupied in the conduct of such industrial activities or of such public utilities as are essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war, and for the maintenance of the efficiency of the people in the State of Maryland, or any part thereof, in performing their part in the conduct of the war. In making such resale and distribution the State fuel administrator of Maryland shall first see that the needs and requirements of consumers entitled to preference in the supply of fuel under the orders of the priorities board are suitably taken care of. In connection with such distribution said Maryland State fuel administrator is authorized to use and employ the services of such persons and agents as he may from time to time select and to make or authorize to be made in the resale and distribution of such coal a charge of not exceeding 15 cents per ton for the compensation and expenses of the persons and agents so selected by him.

The result of this order has been that the wholesale dealers in coal find their coal reconsigned to various persons, some of whom are not any more in need of it for war purposes than were the original consignees. Then the Government agents are absorbing the 15 cents per ton which have been collected by the fuel distributors. In other words, the Government has taken the wholesale distribution of coal entirely into its hands, for which I believe there is no warrant of law.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The contribution of the Senator from West Virginia is interesting in this connection as to governmental operation. Mr. President, I shall conclude in just a sentence.

As I said early in my remarks, it is not at all a pleasing experience to oppose a measure which the administration wants passed in a time of war and national stress. I think, as I look back over the record of the last 14 months, that this will have been the first instance, with perhaps one exception, in which I have opposed any so-called war measure. I think I can say with truth that I have supported every measure that has been sent here from the administration or from the war-making branches of the Government or that has emanated from any committee of this Senate, and which, after due consideration, has been recommended to the Senate as affording an additional weapon in the hands of America. In this case, however, I am free to say that nothing convincing has been stated here upon this floor, nor before a committee of either House of Congress, in the direction of showing that this is, in fact, the putting into the hands of America of another weapon with which to fight this war.

Believing that it carries with it elements of danger, not only those which will arise from inefficient management of these utilities while the war is on, but also in the effect upon that period of reconstruction which must follow the war, I can not follow the path laid down by the committee which reported this joint resolution.

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I want to add one more suggestion to the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], following out the suggestion made by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. A coal shaft can not be opened up in this country now without a license. The Fuel Administrator must license everyone in the coal field before a new coal producer can be added to the list.

Mr. LENROOT and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. THOMAS. I ask for recognition in my own right.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I wish very briefly to state my position upon this joint resolution. If the situation to-day were the same that it was a week ago, I should vote against it. I voted for the recess a week ago to-night because I was not willing to vote upon this resolution in the face of a threatened strike, which, to me, was not a sufficient reason for the President to exercise the power that is sought to be delegated to him by this joint resolution to take over the telegraph and telephone lines of the country. The threat of a strike existed then, and if I believed that there was any possibility of the President taking those utilities over for that reason, I should vote against it. But I have had, and still have, too much confidence in the patriotism and the loyalty of the employees of the telegraph companies of this country to believe that they would for a moment consider the inauguration of a general strike at this time, while this country is in war. During the week that has passed we have had, and no doubt the President has had, a great quantity of evidence from all over the country that there is no possibility of a strike upon the telegraph lines of the country.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me that unless we assume that the President will grossly abuse the discretion that is proposed to be delegated to him in this joint resolution, these lines will not be taken over because of any such threat.

I shall not vote for the resolution because of any request that the President has made to us. I do not believe that the President has made any request of Congress for the passage of this joint resolution that Congress is called upon to consider or to in any way heed. True, he has indorsed this resolution through a Member of the House of Representatives; but, Mr. President, the circumstances were entirely different when he indorsed the joint resolution from what they are to-day.

Let me take just a moment to review the history of this joint resolution. It was first introduced, or one substantially like it, in the House of Representatives on January 4. No action was ever taken upon that joint resolution. A short time ago another similar joint resolution was introduced, and the author of that joint resolution consulted not the President but consulted the Postmaster General; and the hearings in the House show that the Postmaster General made some suggestions to the author of the joint resolution as to some changes in it, which were accepted by the author. The joint resolution was then introduced by him and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House. The chairman of that committee did not refer that resolution to the President in the first instance. The testimony shows that he had no information from the President as to the President's attitude in regard to it; but he did ask for the opinion of the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, and the Postmaster General, and those opinions were given in letters addressed to Mr. SIMS, the chairman, which are found in the RECORD.

In the first place, if we will reflect upon this for just a moment, we will see that the opinions of those three Cabinet officers could not have been otherwise than they were in favor of the resolution, because the joint resolution proposed to delegate an additional power to their superior, their Commander in Chief, the President of the United States; and is it to be supposed that those three Cabinet officers would report to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce against the granting of that power to the President? Of course not. The testimony shows that these three Cabinet officers did not consult the President of the United States. Then the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce asked for the opinions of the President upon the joint resolution, and the President in a letter indorsed the letter of the Postmaster General in that respect. I wish merely to refer to one paragraph in Mr. Burleson's letter of indorsement:

> At this moment the paralysis of a large part of the system of electrical communication is threatened, with possible consequences prejudicial to our military operations and other public activities that might prove serious or disastrous.

Clearly implying that the threat of a strike was the principal reason for the indorsement of the joint resolution upon the part of the Postmaster General. That indorsement the President made his own indorsement; so that, so far as any communication from the President is concerned, it was made at a time when a situation existed which does not exist to-day; and I am compelled to believe that the President was ill advised as to that threat of a strike and the consequences that might follow if the attempt were made to carry it out.

I must say that, from the testimony of the Postmaster General, there does seem to be evidence that he welcomed a situation among the employees of the telegraph companies that would bring about a strike and make it necessary to take the telegraph lines over. I very much regret to find in his testimony the plain statement upon his part that, in his opinion, every employee of the Government should receive a wage from 15 to 30 per cent more than is being paid in similar service in private hands. He stated that with reference to the telegraph lines, without any inquiry as to whether or not the employees of the telegraph companies were receiving sufficient compensation and without any inquiry upon his part as to whether there was any dissatisfaction upon their part with reference to the compensation they were receiving. It really, Mr. President, amounted to an invitation to the employees of the telegraph lines of this country, at that critical time when the threat to strike had been made, to strike, for it said to them, in effect, "If you will strike it will bring about a condition where it will become necessary to take over these lines immediately, and if I, the Postmaster General, shall be placed in charge of the telegraph lines, I will assure you that you will receive a compensation from 15 to 30 per cent higher than you are now receiving, even though you have no complaint at this time."

That is the situation, Mr. President. I very much regret the statements that were made by the Postmaster General, and, because of those statements, if I believed there was the slightest possibility of any attempt being made to carry out that threat I would vote against this joint resolution.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry or an observation along that line?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. PENROSE. I happen to have here a clipping, containing an account of a meeting of the telegraphers of the New York division a few days ago, in which even this seductive invitation of Mr. Burleson was not considered an inducement, because it is said:

> Another resolution was adopted in which it was recommended that the railroad administration, instead of the Post Office Department, be in charge of the wires if taken over by the Government. Speakers opposed the control of the wires by Postmaster General Burleson and stated they preferred Director General McAdoo.

Mr. McAdoo must have outbid Mr. Burleson.

Mr. LENROOT. On that point, Mr. President, I do not assume that, if the time should come—and I hope it will not—when the President will exercise the power delegated to him by this resolution, that that power will be delegated to the Postmaster General, although it is true that Mr. Burleson in the hearings expressed the hope that it would be. I wish to call attention to the fact that if this power is exercised by the President we have a right to assume that he will exercise it only because of military exigencies.

The Postmaster General, in the same testimony, brought out the very interesting fact that recently the administration of the Postal Service in France had been taken away from the Postmaster General and had been assumed by the Secretary of War. In his testimony Mr. Burleson quotes the language of Gen. Pershing, as follows:

> We can not trust information as to the movement of the units—military units—to other than military forces; hence it is necessary for us to take over and militarize the postal service.

Mr. President, if there shall be any reason in the future for taking over the telegraph lines of this country, it must be, it seems to me, for the purpose of guarding military secrets; and the same reasons that impelled the War Department to take away the Postal Service from the Postal Department in France would compel the President to decline to place in the hands of the Postal Department in this country the supervision and control of the communication of intelligence through the telegraph and the telephone.

Having said this much, Mr. President, I wish to state in a word why I shall vote for the joint resolution. I shall vote, first, for the amendment to strike out "telephones," because I can not conceive of any possible occasion in the future when it will be necessary to take them over. I believe that there may be an occasion arise in the future when the President ought to have this power with reference to telegraphs; and I have in mind, Mr. President, in coming to that conclusion, the fact that in the past I have voted to delegate to the President the power to take over for military purposes, for the national security and defense, practically every manufacturing plant in the United States. I have voted to enable him to take over every shipyard in the United States, every elevator in the United States, every mine in the United States. I have voted in the past to grant him these powers; and, to my mind, a much greater exigency may exist at some time in the future to take over the control of the channels of intelligence than may exist with reference to any of the other powers we have granted to him in the past. Having so voted in the past, I do not feel that I can consistently vote to withhold the power from him to take over the telegraph lines if the necessity shall arise. I say that, Mr. President, in the full confidence that he will not abuse the discretion imposed in him by this joint resolution by taking them over upon the threat of any strike by anybody.

Mr. WATSON obtained the floor.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment for the purpose of calling attention to a telegram?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The reason why I ask permission to do it at this time is because it is pertinent to the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and corroborates his statement that there is not now any danger of a strike on the telegraph lines of the country. It is a telegram signed by 129 telegraph operators, employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., at Louisville, Ky.; and I was particularly struck with one sentence in the telegram, as follows:

> Not a person among us is in any manner affiliated, or desires or would be affiliated, with the organization which is endeavoring to do us harm for the gain of those who and the organization of which we speak was inimical until the present time, when it seems to grasp an opportunity unfair, taking advantage of the condition of the country, of the people, and of the Government to further a cause which is not desired by those mainly interested in the cause.

I ask that the entire telegram be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

Mr. THOMAS. It has been printed two or three times.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The telegram is as follows:

LOUISVILLE, KY., July 11, 1918.

Senator POINDEXTER,
Washington, D. C.:

We wish to be considered, first, loyal American citizens, and, second, we wish in all fairness to give credit where credit is due. We believe it only fair to say that we as employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co. have been granted during the last two years increases in salary ranging from 25 to 100 per cent and are at present receiving bonus of 9 to 12 per cent in excess of our regular earnings. To this is added two weeks' vacation with full pay, sickness disability benefits, pensions after permanent disability, and insurance equivalent to one year's salary in case of death without charge or obligation. Working conditions under the Western Union Telegraph Co. are very pleasant, and we have an office force who stand 100 per cent loyal to our Government, and all are well satisfied and doing everything within their power to render a satisfactory and efficient service to our Government, and also to our patrons in general.

* * * * * * *

It seems to desire to force us to its level or accept an alternative which might harm a perfect organization, of which we are a part. We would recommend that the telegraph be handled by its present owners and executives until more evidence of inefficient service is shown. We earnestly request that you do your utmost to help our cause.

F. A. NAU
(And 128 others).

Mr. POINDEXTER. In that connection I beg leave to repeat the suggestion that it seems to me it would be quite interesting and appropriate for the Government, through the Attorney General and the agents of the Department of Justice, to inquire into the antecedents and into the motives of this outside organization and into the leaders of that outside organization who are engaged in an undertaking with what seems to be a concealed or abstruse motive. It is difficult to understand why such an organization should be interested in calling a strike of the employees of the telegraph companies when not a member of the organization is in the employ of the telegraph companies, and the suggestion in this telegram from a large number of these employees as to the crisis which is now pending and as to the advantage which this outside organization seeks to take of the condition of the country and of the people of the country by this means which these very employees present might well be the subject of Governmental inquiry.

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY DANIELS AT NAVAL ACADEMY (S. DOC. NO. 268).

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WATSON. For what purpose does the Senator rise?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. For the purpose of asking unanimous consent, as probably I shall have to leave the Chamber, to have action on a report from the Committee on Printing, to which, on request of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the matter was referred this morning.

Mr. WATSON. Will the Senator kindly wait? I shall not occupy the floor for more than 30 minutes. I shall be glad if the Senator will wait until the expiration of that time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I promise not to take two minutes of the Senator's time.

Mr. WATSON. Well, I have yielded a day and I can wait two minutes longer.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I will not be a minute. I do not wish to take the Senator from the floor. I am occupying his time.

This is a matter presented by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. SWANSON] for printing a speech made by the Secretary of the Navy to the graduating class of the Naval Academy. The Senator from Utah this morning objected to it being printed as a document without being referred to the committee, in which I heartily concur. We are attempting to stop the printing of these things that are not essential. This speech, however, is to be circulated, as I understand, among the young graduates of the Navy as a high call to patriotism and duty, and a great moral lesson is involved. In view of these considerations I thought, since it was to be used for that purpose, that the committee had no cause for opposition; and understanding that this will be no precedent for the publication of any other Secretary's speech I ask unanimous consent that it may be granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution (S. Res. 284) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the address of Hon. Josephus Daniels to the graduating class of 1918, delivered at the Naval Academy June 6, 1918, be printed as a public document.

TELEPHONE AND TELEGRAPH CONTROL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 309) to authorize the President, in time of war, to supervise or take possession and assume control of any telegraph, telephone, marine cable, or radio system or systems or any part thereof and to operate the same in such manner as may be needful or desirable for the duration of the war, and to provide just compensation therefor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, great questions have the habit of reappearing in human history. They reappear among all peoples and in all races; and since the establishment of this Republic we have been confronted at many periods with a tendency on the one hand to confer greater power upon the President, and on the other to confer greater authority upon the majority. It is the larger outlines of this problem in which I am more deeply interested than in the immediate passage of the joint resolution under consideration, because, having all my mature life been something of a student of the Government ownership and operation of public utilities and having also devoted some time to the study of the fundamental principles and the underlying policies of socialism, I am profoundly convinced that the passage of this joint resolution is but the opening of the door to that policy which, if relentlessly pursued, means inevitably a change in our form of government.

Senators, all scholars have studied our institutions historically. They have learned that progress is a monument reared only on the battle field of contending forces. From scenes of conflict in the past they have seen great principles arise and take the form of law. From these principles they have seen decisions spring as innumerable as the sands of the shore in the efforts of courts to apply these principles to all the complex affairs of men. And they have seen how all the struggles and sacrifices of 60 centuries finally resulted in the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, the greatest document ever issued among men.

They have seen how this embodiment of fundamental principles guarantees to every man beneath its protecting ægis the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that these rights carry with them the accompanying rights of the ownership and use of private property, of religious liberty, and the freedom of person. They have seen, too, how this organic law was afterwards altered so that there might be embedded forever in its solid granite the limitations upon the power of the majority imposed by its first five amendments.

SWEEPING ASIDE FUNDAMENTAL LAW.

Now, if this fundamental law is to be swept aside by the vote of a majority, if these basic ideas are to be overturned by a mere choice of the people, then principles are but illusions, the Constitution is a myth, fundamentals are hallucinations, law and order are iridescent dreams, courts are but the puppets of a maddened majority, organized society is an impossibility, and beneficent government is a Utopia that can never be realized among men. And I want to discuss for you some of the proposed movements of the day that will, if unchecked, lead us into conditions far worse than any from which we seek to escape.

At the time of the formation of the Constitution the fathers were confronted with innumerable difficulties, but, fortunately for us, fortunately for mankind, they were equal to the herculean task. Gladstone has passionately exclaimed that the men who formulated that document were "great men, not for that time alone, but for any time, for all time."

These men had a most thorough and accurate knowledge of all the experiments in government made in the centuries gone. With profound insight into human nature and human motives, they understood at once the strength and the weakness of all these attempts at government, and they sought to formulate a system that would preserve the one and eliminate the other.

They gleaned from the frightful pages of history that governments in the past had not endured because they had failed to recognize one or the other of the two fundamentals of all stable government—the rights of the individual on the one hand and the rights of the State on the other.

They knew that in some countries the fundamental principle of the government established was individual right and individual liberty—the one dominating, overwhelming idea being that the individual was everything and the State nothing. They saw that the application of that theory to the affairs of government ended in a tyranny of the one man so despotic that it could not long be tolerated, and that all such efforts resulted in an utter failure to accomplish the chief end for which government must be designed if it is to endure.

They understood, too, that in other countries the fundamental principle upon which their governments were established was the right and power of the majority—the one undisputed idea being that the State was everything and the individual nothing, and that the State was but the will of the majority as expressed at any given time.

They saw that governments thus established were unstable because the individual was entirely submerged and the minority was given no consideration whatever, and, of course, inasmuch as the man and the minority were deemed to have no rights, there was no provision made in any of these countries for protecting or defending them. Our fathers saw that this led to a tyranny of the majority as despotic and far more dangerous than the tyranny of the individual, for no matter how galling the rule of the one tyrant, the majority can finally overthrow his power and, if need be, destroy him. But who can behead the majority? No matter how intolerable their rule, what power can stay the hand of the multitude?

And, therefore, our fathers saw that if they would establish a permanent government they must nicely adjust and balance the rights of the individual on the one hand and the rights of the State on the other, giving to each the largest possible sphere of activity consistent with the rights of the other, and securing each from indiscriminate invasion by the other.

They knew, as every student of history must know, that the great struggles of the past were to secure the recognition of individual liberty; and they saw, as we, too, must see, that all governments that failed to take this fundamental into account when establishing their institutions have failed and fallen and passed into history.

They learned that because of this failure monarchies were destroyed, kingdoms subverted, principalities ruined, aristocracies overthrown, and that they were all finally swept away by the ever-ascending spirit of individual liberty, which is the white-winged angel of human progress. And yet they learned from a study of the past, as we, too, must learn, that any government founded upon the one overmastering principle of the liberty of the individual can not endure. And so our fathers were confronted with the duty of recognizing and preserving the rights of the individual on the one hand and at the same time giving equal recognition to and preservation of the rights of the State. And they wrought so splendidly, they wove a fabric so enduring, that from that time to this the progress of our country has challenged the wonder and the admiration of the world.

And yet to-day, despite all of this progress and all of these achievements, that very fabric is threatened by an insidious danger and I believe that there can be no industrial peace, there can be no political peace, until these problems are settled and settled right; and no problem is ever permanently settled in this world until it is settled in accordance with eternal principle.

AUTOCRATIC AUTHORITY.

In my judgment we are confronted in the pending measure with a proposition that in the first place will add to the autocratic authority of one man, and on the other hand will give increasing power to the majority. Senators, these institutions of ours are based upon four fundamentals. They are, first, individual rights, and to preserve these individual rights a government threefold in character—legislative, executive, and judicial. The four pillars of enduring representative government, founded upon a constitution and preserved by its provisions, are, therefore, individual rights—the power of the legislature, the power of the executive, and the power of the courts. If either one of these pillars be pulled down by any blind Samson, the whole edifice will crumble and fall to ruin. Therefore, when we come to consider the proposition of giving increased power either to the President of the United States or to the people of the United States, we threaten the invasion of the sphere of representative government from both sides which, if persisted in, must inevitably bring the whole fabric to destruction.

What do I mean by that proposition? Senators, we all know that for many years in this country the inevitable, aye, the well-nigh irresistible, tendency has been to augment the authority of the President of the United States. This has resulted, first, because of the general demand of the people, who almost universally believe in the President and insist on his sole leadership; and, second, because of his being the titular head of the party in power, and the general desire of Members of Congress to follow his leadership for political reasons. To this is added the necessary power of the President in the time of war, there being a universal recognition of the fact that the President is the head of the Government and that making war requires in many of its aspects the forceful leadership of a single man. This policy has been pursued both in peace and in war until now the President wields a power unprecedented in the history of the world. It is quite true that much of this authority has been conferred since the beginning of this conflict, because we have all constantly realized that the necessities of war recognize no limitations and know no bounds.

But yet he has the power; it is now in his hands; and we must trust alone to his patriotism and to his wisdom to use it wisely in the interests of the people and of the Government and not in a manner that will result disastrously to their highest concerns; and we must likewise trust to the wisdom and courage of Congress and the stability and determination of the people to see to it that this temporary power is turned back by the President to its legitimate spheres when the emergency that has caused its bestowal shall have happily passed.

And so, Mr. President, applying these fundamental principles to the question at issue, what will be the inevitable result if these utilities are turned over to governmental control? The only three sponsors for it have announced that if they could determine the future of these properties they would be permanently owned by the Government. And therefore we know that if we pass this bill we shall have these three powerful factors of the administration using all the additional power we thus place in their hands to force the full and final Government ownership of all these properties.

Senators assert that this power will probably never be exercised, that these properties will not be taken over unless the President is compelled to act by the force of some great emergency. But let us not delude ourselves with that fond hope. They will be taken over, and all their great force of operatives will be under the direct control of the Government within 60 days. Once clothed with the authority to sieze them, it will be easy enough to find a compelling emergency.

This movement was inaugurated when the railroads were taken over; it is to be continued by the passage of the pending bill; it will be followed by taking full possession of the mines; and, unless Congress rises to check the onrushing tide, all the factories in the country engaged in the manufacture of munitions of war supplies will be laid hold of, and all the industries of the Nation, save alone agriculture, will soon be under complete governmental control, and that will be so regulated as to be dominated by the bureaucracy at the National Capital.

ROAD TO SOCIALISM.

Therefore, unless we are willing to march to the end along the highway upon which we have set out, let us not take these first steps, for, I warn you, Senators, that just as surely as we pass this legislation, just as surely as this movement is continued, it will mean a fight to the death with national and international socialism when the tides of war shall have rolled away. Therefore I, for one, am not willing to take this step. Four millions of people on the pay roll, four millions of Government employees at the close of the war, four millions of persons under direct obligation to the administration will constitute a tremendous organization to transform governmental control in time of war to governmental ownership in time of peace; and, if we are to credit Baker and Daniels and Burleson, this is the avowed object of it all.

If it be contended that this is a military necessity I deny the contention. Not a single syllable of evidence has been adduced to support that theory. Not one fact has been cited to sustain that statement. This bill is deliberately brought forward as a distinct step toward complete Government control, and this policy, by the use of the very force it will provide, is to be pushed to complete Government ownership at the close of this struggle.

If it be stated that this prediction is only an idle dream, I answer that this use of these forces has already begun in this country and will become more and more dangerous as the number of industries under Government control is increased. "There is not room enough in this great world for the German flag and the American flag," remarked Secretary McAdoo at El Paso, Tex., to a meeting of railroad employees, on the 17th of April, "and we are going to make the American flag fly over Berlin before we get through." And then he continued: "The railroads must function 150 per cent, for we are not employees of the railroad companies but of Uncle Sam, enlisted in the great legion of liberty." He asked the men not to become impatient because of the delay of the fixing of the new wage schedule, adding that if a raise was granted to the railroad men it would be retroactive and they would then be able to buy liberty bonds.

POLITICS IN GOVERNMENT CONTROL OF RAILROADS.

Then came this significant statement which points the moral to my argument, in which he says:

> You are all my boys, and I don't intend to let anyone kick you around, for I will defend you to the limit when you are right, and you won't go wrong I am sure.

That was as straight a bid for control as was ever made anywhere in this land. Suppose there were 4,000,000 of them, as there will be when this bill passes, can not anyone see the power, can not anyone apprehend the danger? And what was the inevitable result? Scarcely had his words ceased to echo throughout the country until there was a perceptible letting down in efficiency among railroad men. This is but human nature, and nothing less was to be expected, for if the men who are employed are told by the man who employs them that, in substance, they can do as they please, and that nobody shall be permitted to interfere, as a matter of course that will result in a greater laxity in the performance of duty.

Everybody knows that this is the situation with the railroads to-day, and everybody must know, too, that the governmental control of the lines affected by this bill will mean a greater degree of inefficiency in their operation, just as it does wherever the Government controls. And this movement for Government ownership, like a ball of snow, gathers force as it is pushed along, and that is the very object of this measure. Its sponsors seek to enlist more people in favor of this policy to place a greater number on the pay roll, people directly responsible to the administration for employment.

No sooner had the railroads been taken over than wages were increased $300,000,000. Who doubts that similar measures will come with reference to these lines after the passage of this bill? And thus will all these people be placed under additional obligation to the party in power.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GORE. I did not understand the Senator to state whether the compensation was increased $300,000,000 to the railroad men or the farmers.

Mr. WATSON. The railway men. I had understood that the farmers would pay a part of that $300,000,000, but would have no increase on what they produce.

However, permit me to further reply to the Senator, there is too much of a tendency here and now and always to accentuate class existence in the United States. Some want legislation for the farmers. Some want legislation for the laboring men. Some want legislation for the manufacturers. Others want legislation for the men engaged in some particular calling or vocation. I object to that sort of class legislation. We ought to have laws passed for the benefit of the whole American people, knowing that what inures to the benefit of one will, if it be a just policy of government, inure to the benefit of all, and that what helps all will, with the proper exercise of industry, help each individual unit of society.

Now, let me address myself to the two propositions announced yesterday by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. His first assumption was that the President of the United States has the right to communicate with Congress in any manner that may seem appropriate to him. He was led to this remark because of the fact that in the present instance the President has not communicated his desires to Congress with reference to the pending proposition save, perhaps, in a letter to a Member of the Senate.

The Constitution provides that the President may, from time to time, communicate to Congress his ideas respecting legislation. The present President has followed the custom of a personal address to the two Houses of Congress assembled in one Chamber. This course he had the right to pursue, but he might with equal propriety have chosen to send a written message to each of the two Houses, as had been the custom of Presidents from the time of Jefferson until the advent of Wilson. But if he follow the direction of the Constitution, he must communicate to the Congress. I do not believe that it fulfills the demands of the Constitution for him to write a letter or address a private communication to any Member of either body, and, therefore, I do not know that the President demands the passage of the proposed law, and certainly there is nothing in any alleged communication at any time received from him with regard to this bill that urges its enactment as a military necessity.

SHALL CONGRESS ABDICATE ITS FUNCTIONS?

The second proposition announced by the able Senator from Illinois was that when the President has once made known his wish to the Senate we should without hesitation accede to it. I deny that statement. In my judgment, it fails utterly to compass the intendment of the fathers in formulating the Constitution or of recognizing the legitimate spheres of activity of the coordinate branches of government provided by that instrument.

The evident object of his entire speech was to defend that proposition. Judging by the rule he lays down, if any Senator or any Representative fail to carry out the express wish of the President he is in a manner unfriendly to the prosecution of the war and is thwarting the efforts of the administration to successfully conduct it. I most vigorously refute that theory.

Senators, how far may we justly go in opposing the desires of the President or in criticizing his action in time of war? If we concede that we are to have no voice whatever in the matter, except to register the presidential will, if the legislative branch of government is to be merged wholly into the executive, and if we are to be denied any opinion as to the merits of any measure he proposes, then Congress has entirely abdicated its functions and might quite as well adjourn without day.

Mr. President, as to the object of this war we are all one. No political issue can be raised upon any proposition that everybody is for, and we all know that everybody is for this war. To succeed in this conflict is the one supreme mission of the hour. It is the one all-important duty of all the people of the land. To it all other duties are subsidiary; to it all other propositions are subordinate. Therefore there can be no issue in that, because we are all for it, and for it to the relentless end. That being the one universal purpose, we may make new definitions respecting the attitude of our citizenship toward it. That is to say, that any man in America who is for the object of this war is a patriot, and that any man in America who is against the object of this war is a traitor. Men of all parties can meet on that common ground, and to that inclusive definition we can all agree.

But that is as to the object of the war. When we stand upon the seashore and look outward we are all one. Politics in the United States ceases at the shore line. Looking outward we proclaim to all the nations of the earth with many-voiced harmony that as a united America we are resolved to stand by American rights and to vindicate American liberty whenever and wherever assailed by any nation in all the broad circle of the earth. As to that resolution we are all one.

But when we turn our eyes inward and investigate the methods by which that object shall be accomplished, we are essentially many men of many minds. While we are all trying to reach one goal, and are determined to reach it at whatever cost, the highway by which we shall travel to arrive at it is as much a matter of my judgment as it is the judgment of the President of the United States. That is up to the individual judgment and the individual conscience of the individual Senator sent here to represent a sovereign State in the greatest legislative body in the world.

The question of the method by which we shall achieve victory, then, is not one for the exclusive determination of the Chief Executive, but a problem for the correct solution of which each individual Member of Congress is also responsible, and I resent utterly the imputation that if any such Member fails to concur with the views of the President on all of these propositions he is unfriendly to the purpose of the war.

In the second place, it is worthy of all consideration that there is a clear line of demarcation between the military power of the President and his authority in the civil establishment of the country. He is the Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. The Constitution confers that power upon him. That is, therefore, his constitutional right. Congress may not invade that sovereign sphere, nor, if the Constitution is to be respected and maintained, can the people themselves interfere with that right. That power he may not share with others. That power Congress can not divide with him. It is his in accordance with the basic law of the Republic, and as such Commander in Chief I shall follow him to the end.

Because it is his sovereign duty completely to fill that sphere, a binding obligation rests upon every other citizen of the Nation to acquiesce in that right. This is the one remnant of autocratic power transferred from the past to the present, from Europe to the United States, by the framers of the Constitution. These men were not unacquainted with war. They had just emerged from what to them was seven years of exacting and wasteful strife. They had seen the disastrous results of many-headed counsel in the War of the Revolution. Therefore our fathers wisely determined that there must be one head to the Military Establishment of the United States, and they embedded forever in the solid structure of that instrument the provision that the President should be Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy. That is his sovereign right, and as such it is our manifest duty to follow him.

If it be said that Congress has the right to raise and equip armies, I concur. That is not a presidential function; that is wholly a legislative function. Congress has the right to establish and maintain navies. This is entirely within the purview of our authority. But after we have raised armies, after we have established navies, the only point of contact that the legislative branch has with the Army and the Navy is to raise revenue to support them. After being raised and established, the Army and the Navy pass over into the Executive sphere of action free from the influence of legislative authority.

Congress can not wage war. Congress has no right to attempt it. The President alone is the director of the disposition of navies and the placement of armies, and, therefore, as Commander in Chief of the Army, I follow him. He is my commander as much as that of any man who wears the uniform. And if, in the exercise of this great power, the President deems it necessary to send our Army into France or into any other country to beat back the militant hosts of Germany, he has that sovereign right, and this no man, or set of men, may either gainsay or deny. Nor has Congress, nor have the people, the right to know as to the movement of armies or the disposition of ships, lest by spreading such knowledge to the enemy harm may be done to our cause. We unwaveringly support him as the head of our Army and Navy, and shall do so to the end.

But while that is true as to the Military Establishment, it is not essentially true as to the industry of the country. Congress alone has power to regulate commerce. The President of the United States, for instance, can not take charge of the mines without the authority of Congress. It is the legislative function to regulate them as well as agriculture and manufacturing and transportation and navigation. That is the province of the legislative body. The President of the United States has no more right to invade that sphere without our invitation than we have to invade his sphere and determine upon the location of troops or the disposition of navies.

Financial and economic problems are not to be controlled by one man in our system of government, except in the case of most exigent necessity. Congress alone has the right to assume the initiative in dealing with these problems. It is true that Congress may delegate to the President vast power in these fields of activity if in its judgment it is essential to military success, but without such delegation the President has no power to seize and exercise such authority. Therefore it is exclusively our right to determine how far we shall transfer this power of Congress under the Constitution into his hands and his sphere and give this authority over into his keeping and management. That is the sovereign right of every Senator and of every Representative who sits beneath the dome of this Capitol.

Therefore, when the President of the United States sends down word in some indirect and roundabout way that he would like to have control of all the telegraph and all telephone lines of the country, it is up to me to decide for myself as to whether or not that is a wise proposition, and as to whether or not it is essential to the winning of this war. I am under no obligation to obey that voice unless it appeals to my conscience and addresses itself to my judgment, because Congress controls the Civil Establishment of the United States.

LAVISH POWERS.

In very truth, the present Congress has conferred upon him greater authority than is exercised by any other living man, and, in fact, has transferred to him practically all the power it has, save alone the right to raise revenue.

Under these conditions, with the administration demanding and receiving such grants of power, is it conceivable that if mistakes are made or if errors are committed, that we, the representatives of the people, are to sit still with sealed lips and bridled tongues and offer no suggestions as to improvements or betterments?

And, in dealing with problems of such vast moment and consequence, is it thinkable than anyone is to be branded as a traitor or as a copperhead because he does not immediately accept any intimation, however diluted, that may emanate from the White House?

I resent such imputation. It is unworthy of anyone who holds a seat in this exalted place.

I profoundly believe that the investigations made by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs stimulated executive activity to such a degree that many of the things demanded have been conceded and that many of the errors committed have been corrected.

Just criticism, judicially made, with the sole object of improving the situation, can not possibly lend aid or comfort to the enemy; glossing over and concealing inactivity, incompetency, and inefficiency may render vital, though unintended, assistance to our opponents in this war.

I am now, and at all times have been, ready to vote for any measure, however extreme, that in my judgment is necessary to win this war; but it is my judgment that must be exercised as a Senator of the United States and not the judgment of any other man, and that judgment is not convinced that the enactment of the pending measure is necessary to success in this conflict.

But we hear on every hand the resounding cry, "Stand by the President!" and we shall hear more of it in the coming days. But let it be understood once for all that if this means to stand by him as the constitutional head of the Government, it will find a ready response throughout the land. If it means to stand by him as Commander in Chief of the military forces of the Nation, it will be indorsed by every patriot beneath the flag. But if it means to stand by him as a politician and a partisan, it will be resented by a multitude throughout the Union who do not believe in taking advantage of so terrible a situation as the present one to reap a partisan harvest. If it means to stand by him as the head of a party organization, I shall oppose it while I have voice to sound forth my protest.

I pluck no leaf from the laurel wreath that adorns the brow of the great man who sits yonder in the White House, in the loftiest station of the earth; but yet we must all recognize the patent fact that Presidents are but incidents in the history of the land. As President of the United States, as the constitutional head of the Republic, as Commander in Chief of the Army and the Navy, he shall have my unstinted support, and I shall readily accede to any request he makes that appeals to my judgment as a necessity of war. But as the head of a political organization, or as one who is seeking his own reelection, he shall have none of my support.

Men come and men go, but institutions remain. Nations come; they play their part upon the stage and pass into history, but fundamentals abide. I look away beyond Woodrow Wilson as an individual, to the Constitution, the country, and the flag, and when they tell me to "Stand by the President" I construe that to mean to stand by the Constitution, stand by the country, and stand by the flag, and stand by Woodrow Wilson as President of the United States, clothed with executive power, representing them all. That is my doctrine, and by that I am willing to either stand or fall.

But to proceed with my argument. We now have the Government control of railroads, and if to that we are to add a like control of telegraphs and telephones, of express companies, and of mines, we shall have on the pay roll 4,000,000 of people, subject to all the temptations of American political life. There is not a man in this Chamber who does not know precisely what that means.

These people will inevitably organize to help themselves, and to this end they will not scruple to use their power with the ruling administration. The tendency of that administration will undoubtedly be to accede to those demands, to raise wages if there be even a pretext for such a movement, and to comply with whatever other demand may be made. This is human nature and can not be cast aside, and we all know to what extent political parties will go in the heat of campaigns.

But, we must not forget that, as we increase the number of Government employees working under the direction of the Chief Executive, we inevitably increase his power; and that, as we increase the number of persons subject to his appointment or removal, we augment his influence over the legislative body, whose members are seeking these appointments.

Congress is even now subservient to the President's wish, at times manifesting a willingness to obey his every mandate that is almost abject. Increase the number of persons he appoints and you increase this power; increase this power and you augment his authority over the legislative body; take this step and you inevitably undermine the independence and shatter the strength of the legislative branch of the Government.

And, singularly enough, this causes the invasion of the legislative sphere from both sides, for, by placing this greater number under the control of the Government, it makes possible the adoption of the policies of the initiative, the referendum, the recall, and all the other incipient stages of socialism, the inevitable tendency and the express object of which is to weaken the legislative branch of government.

We see the manifest results of one phase of such a policy in Mexico, where the right of the majority to rule is unquestioned, and where this unbridled majority is not held in subjection by a powerful autocrat, as it was in the days of Diaz.

We see such results also in many similar efforts in the history of the past, and by scanning the present situation in some of our South American Republics, as well as in Mexico to-day, where the will of the majority is unquestioned, where individual liberty is set at naught, where individual rights count for nothing, where the minority is ruthlessly trampled under foot by the unscrupulous power of the maddened majority. In those countries, and, more and more in this country, the people follow men and not measures; they advocate leaders and not ideas; they crystallize their forces about persons and not parties; the brilliant leader of to-day will be overthrown by the brilliant leader of to-morrow; the whimsey of this hour will be cast aside by the whimsey of the next hour; and stability, which springs alone from an unwavering adherence to fixed principles of government, and which is essential to progress and prosperity, is unknown.

GERMANY OWNS HER RAILROADS.

We see in Germany a manifestation of the other extreme. That country is the most highly socialized nation in the world. The German Government owns all the railroads; it owns all the telegraph and telephone lines; it owns the express companies; it owns or controls all the lines of steamboats. Their education is all conducted at public expense; their great free laboratories are unexcelled in the world; bounties are paid on every hand, to her inventors, her scientists, and her philosophers. Germany's laws touching workmen's compensation, employers' liability, old-age pensions, and all such similar paternalistic legislation, make for the highest degree of socialization ever before known on this earth.

But how is it all wielded? By the one man at the head of it all, the one tyrant who governs it all and controls it all, and who wields that immense organization because this socialized state enables him to do it. A sufficient number of the people are directly responsible to the Government to enable the Kaiser to organize them, to control them, to use them for his own purposes and that is precisely the direction in which we are headed in this country.

Mr. President, we are coming nearer and nearer every day to that system in this Nation, for, if we pursue to the limit the policy of the proposed measure, it will be a question of a very few years until a President will be able to force his reelection for life: First, the autocratic authority of one man; second, the enlarged power of the people, the two acting together and reacting upon each other and constantly weakening the legislative branch of the Government. This is as inescapable as the deductions of logic, and we can no more free ourselves from these manifest results than we can from the laws of nature.

What reason is there why this branch of our Government should be weakened or its usefulness in any wise impaired? Why should its foundations be undermined? No other nation boasts of such progress as ours since this system was adopted. Under these institutions, where liberty is regulated by law and where the Constitution guarantees the largest measure of individual rights with the largest measure of community rights, we have gone from success to triumph, and from triumph to glory, and are enabled to-day to shoulder the mighty burdens of the world. Unless, therefore, there be some very urgent reason, some imperative demand, for a change in our form of government, no excuse can be offered for the adoption of the policy of Government ownership proposed by all the socialists of the day, in the inauguration of which policy the pending measure is an important step.

So, Senators, I am not in favor of this joint resolution. I am not going to analyze it at length, because you have all heard is discussed. In the first place, there is no excuse for it; in the next place, there is no emergency; and in the next place it has only filtered down to us until the little stream is so diluted that we can only suspect its source. But, even if the President does want it, unless he gives a good reason for it I am not bound to vote for it, and I shall not vote for it because I do not consider it a necessity. I know that there is no emergency that calls for it. I remember that he can now take charge of the radio service; that he can now control all our outgoing messages; that we already have censorship in this country; and these safeguards are, in my judgment, all sufficient, judging from the evidence we now have.

"NOT A MILITARY NECESSITY NOW"—SECRETARY BAKER.

The question was asked of Secretary Baker in the hearings before the House committee:

Do you believe that this taking over of the possession, operation, and control of the telephone and telegraph lines is a military necessity?

To which he responded:

I do not think it is a military necessity at this minute, but it might easily become a military necessity the next minute.

And upon that vague theory, and upon that misty supposition that he brought down from somewhere out yonder in the wide realm of conjecture, he finds sufficient justification for asking the Congress of the United States to turn over to the keeping of the Executive hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of property, touching practically every home in this broad land. I for one decline to respond to that sort of logic.

What else did he say about it? On page 18 of the same hearings:

Mr. MONTAGUE. I want to ask one question, Mr. Secretary. So far as the business carried on by the telephone and telegraph is concerned, has the service been inadequate, insufficient, or not?

What did Secretary Baker say in response?

I have not had any opportunity to observe the general situation throughout the country.

And yet without any knowledge of the subject, confessing absolute ignorance of the whole situation, he asks Congress to turn over to the Chief Executive all of these vast properties extending throughout the domain of the Nation.

"NO SERIOUS LEAKAGE OF MESSAGES"—SECRETARY DANIELS.

But what else? What did Secretary Daniels have to say on that proposition? Here is the question asked:

Mr. BARKLEY. Has your department experienced any difficulty on account of leakage of messages transmitted from one part of the United States to the other over the telegraph lines?

Secretary DANIELS. Not serious.

And there it is. Senators, there is no evidence of any necessity; there is not the slightest intimation of an emergency. They already have control of the radios; they already have control of all outgoing messages; and so far as the wires of the Associated Press and these other press bureaus are concerned, they can have them on demand, and the men who control them say so. What occasion, therefore, is there for the enactment of this joint resolution?

Let me give you my judgment as to why there is a pretended occasion for it; and I think that this solves the whole problem; it clears away all the mists and clouds of doubt and darkness, and lets the sun in upon this entire transaction:

Secretary BAKER. Well, I can only express a personal and unstudied preference in the matter. If I had my way about it, there would not be any limitation of time put in. That is the position I would have taken on the subject of railroad legislation.

And Mr. Daniels, on page 27, used the following language, showing conclusively where he stands on this proposition:

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Secretary, I would like to ask if you regard this resolution as a strictly war provision?

Secretary DANIELS. In its present aspect; yes. As a fundamental principle of government, I also think it is very important.

Then, further on, after Representative WINSLOW had asked him many questions seeking to elicit his views, Secretary Daniels apparently impetuously exclaimed:

If you wish my views, I would say it ought to last forever.

Then when Mr. Burleson came upon the witness stand he gave cheerful and ready testimony in support of the same proposition. Therefore, the three witnesses that were adduced there to prove the proposition admit no emergency, give no excuse, frankly state that there is nothing wrong with the telegraph or the telephone service of the country, that there is no occasion for criticism in their operation from a loyal standpoint, but yet all three of them, sitting in the presence of the House committee, assert that they think that this control should be given now and made permanent hereafter.

Now, Senators, it is just as plain as the sun that shines in yonder noonday sky that this is but the beginning of the permanent ownership of these utilities, and that these three Cabinet officers, having no other excuse or even pretext for the passage of this resolution, have voiced their own real sentiments and expressed the true emotions of their hearts when they say that they are in favor of the permanency of this proposition. That is the beginning. No man may lift the veil, peer into the future, and see the end, if we this day inaugurate this policy.

But I have made a motion to strike out the word "telephone." I wonder if any Senator believes that there is any testimony as to telephones at all? The word is mentioned but three times in the hearings, and nobody has expressed an emergency; nobody has given an excuse; nobody has uttered a sentence that is a justification for the passage of this joint resolution so far as the telephones are concerned. Oh, but it is said it is not intended to take over the telephones. Mr. President, let me quote Secretary Daniels on that proposition, in answer to a question by Mr. COOPER of Ohio:

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Secretary, just one question: Did I understand you to say that you believed the Government ought to be able to control all private conversation in my home over the telephone?

Secretary DANIELS. I believe the Government ought to have control of all communication, and—

Speaking to this Representative—

and safeguard you so that you could have your private communication by Government officials instead of by private employees of a company.

So, Senators, this control, like the pests of Egypt, is to be brought into our very kneading troughs; it is to reach into every home; and we are to have an army of men going up and down the country nosing into everybody's business, spying into everybody's affairs. It matters not that a man is as loyal to the flag as is the President himself, all his private communications with his friends and neighbors are to be censored by representatives of the Government he helps to sustain. I denounce that as an un-American policy unworthy of the traditions and history of this great Republic; and I shall never give my assent to a proposition that will fill the Republic with spies and interfere with the freedom of communication in the Nation.

If the loyalty or patriotism of any man is suspected, let him be investigated, let him be placed under surveillance, let his communications be censored, but do not, in order to catch the guilty few, inaugurate a universal system of espionage in the country that will prove expensive and oppressive and achieve no results comparable to the mischief it will produce.

Mr. NEW. And spying on us.

Mr. WATSON. Yes.

Now, Senators, just another word. I have made a motion to except the lines of the Associated Press and of the other press bureaus. The Associated Press, I find from their announcement—is a mutual organization of persons representing more than 1,100 morning, evening, and Sunday newspapers, having for its purpose the collection and distribution of the important news of the world. For its most important service the Associated Press has its own leased wires, which form a network across the continent from Bangor, Me., to Seattle, Wash., and San Diego, Cal., and from Duluth, Minn., to New Orleans, Galveston, and Habana. The total mileage of this leased wire system is approximately: Day wires, 22,000 miles; night wires, 30,000. From various points along the trunk lines the report is sent to adjacent cities.

Senators, these lines give a 24-hour service in the Associated Press, half that time in the United Press, and half that time, as I understand, in the Hearst or International Service. So far as the two are concerned, the Government could very easily take the lines and use them while the press bureaus are not using them; but so far as the Associated Press is concerned they have a 24-hour service. Does anybody know of any reason why the Government should take those lines over for its own use except in case of the most exigent emergency? And if that shall arise does anybody imagine that the owners and the editors of the patriotic papers who operate these lines would decline to yield to the Government? In fact, if any information is correct, they have already yielded whenever requested.

Not only that, Senators, but there is a voluntary censorship now which prevents any news from going over these lines that the Government deems too valuable for the public to see, or too vital for the people to know. Does anybody know of a single instance in which it has been violated? Take all the movements of troops from this country, from points of embarkation to Europe, does anybody know of any instance in which the embarkation of a single man has been reported in any of these newspapers? I do not.

In what respect, then, have they violated the confidence reposed in them? In no single instance have they been false to their obligations to the Government. And if not, why is an additional censorship necessary as to them? It is not.

But why, on the other hand, should they be free to publish the news, limited only by requests of the Government, and subject to many existing laws for willful violation?

Senators, the continued existence of this Government is possible only on the theory that a majority of the people are intelligent enough to understand its operation; that they understand, first, the fundamental principles upon which it is founded, and, secondly, the issues involved in every campaign, and that they know enough to vote intelligently. But if all the springs of information are tainted, if all the sources of knowledge are polluted, the people may not know, and if they do not know they can not act aright, and if they can not act aright their ignorance will ultimately destroy a Republic founded necessarily upon the intelligence of the great majority.

And therefore I plead for the freedom of the press, which has been the bulwark of these institutions.

Mr. President, I wish, before I close, to advert to my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], whose voice I am always glad to hear. Yesterday in his remarks, to which I listened with a keen and indeed an unusual interest, he made the statement that we should follow the President; that in the day of stress, in the time of storm, and in the hour of peril, we should hear only the voice of the Chief Executive.

Let me call the Senator's attention to the fact that a very marvelous change has come over the spirit of his dreams. I recall that the present Senator was, during the Spanish-American War, a brilliant Representative from the State of Washington, the colleague, if I mistake not, of my friend, the present Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. In that body, at that time, my friend from Illinois made a speech, and I wish to read a portion of it to you in order to show the marked difference between the views of the then Representative from the State of Washington and those announced with so much cogency and force on the floor of the Senate yesterday by the present Senator from Illinois.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, before the Senator proceeds, I wish to suggest that it was another Jones who sat in the House at that time.

Mr. WATSON. I knew that there were a good many Joneses, and I was not sure which Jones it was. I thank the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, it is only fair for me to say that it was the present Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] who defeated me and succeeded me in the House.

RECORD OF A DEMOCRAT IN SPANISH-AMERICAN WAR.

Mr. WATSON. In that speech, delivered on the 3d day of May, 1898, the then very able Representative from the State of Washington used this language; and I wish Senators to quiet themselves now in order to meditate calmly upon the fact of my brilliant friend from Washington having uttered these sentiments when the Spanish-American War was on, when we had a Republican President, and that they may realize fully the contrast between them and those he expressed in such flowing diction yesterday:

I have listened too often, Mr. Speaker, to the constant cry of "patriotism" as the reason for legislating measure after measure here, and only the other day we heard from our honorable friends on the other side that patriotism should always drive us into the line of action which shall execute the desire of the other side, irrespective of any virtue or vice of the measure.

Does not that have a homelike sound? [Laughter.]

On this side of the House there arises, now and then, as did my friend from New York, the distinguished and honorable gentleman, Amos Cummings, who advised this assembly that he "put his country above party," and under that cry certain gentlemen on the floor, under his leadership, calling themselves Democrats, found it agreeable to support the measure mortgaging the generation and their children yet unborn, irrespective of the fundamental justice of it.

That was at the beginning of the Spanish-American War, and the remarks quoted had reference to a revenue bill incorporating a provision for a $600,000,000 bond issue and against which my friend voted "no."

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator does not wish to do me an injustice, I am sure.

Mr. WATSON. I would not do so for the world.

Mr. LEWIS. I have not for years seen the speech, and, of course, I can not now recall all its details.

Mr. WATSON. I congratulate the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. But, as I remember that speech, it was addressed not to what the President demanded but to what the other side, which was then the Republican majority, exacted in a measure that was being put upon us. It did not relate to the command or request of the Executive, the then President of the United States. Am I right? If I am, the Senator will say so.

Mr. WATSON. I will tell the Senator whether he is right or not.

Mr. LEWIS. Well, this is the time. I have not seen that speech for years; and I am asking the Senator if that was not the reference, and if that was not the basis of the speech?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I wish to say in reference to the Senator——

Mr. LEWIS. If the Senator will pardon me, yesterday my reference was to the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army.

DEMOCRAT FAILS TO SUPPORT PRESIDENT IN 1898 WAR.

Mr. WATSON. The question came before the House of Representatives as to whether or not they should vote a bond issue of $600,000,000 to support the President and the administration in the Spanish-American War. That was the question. Was not that the voice of the President? Was not that the voice of the Commander in Chief? Was not that to carry out the military program? But my friend voted "no"; and, not only that, but he wanted to read everybody out of his party who did not vote with him.

Mr. LEWIS. I answer the Senator, if he will permit me, that that was not the voice of the President; that was not the request of the President. It was in reference to no measure of the President, but with reference to one of those measures exquisitely conceived in the name of patriotism which the Republican majority were putting on the minority when they knew the minority were helpless and could not defend themselves against them.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator from Illinois suppose for a moment that the Spanish-American War could have been conducted without funds or that it was not necessary to replenish the Treasury? We had to issue bonds to get the money with which to arm and equip our boys and put them on the battle front, wherever it might be, and yet, for the purpose of that preparation my friend from Illinois voted "no," because it came from "the other side of the House."

Now, let me go on. My friend the Senator says he has not read the speech for some years. I trust that he will enjoy my rereading of it in his presence. [Laughter.]

I realize that my friend from New York, who holds a high place on the floor, and deservedly so—

Referring to Amos J. Cummings (Democrat)— not only from his ability but by his long service, may have a right to dictate to a great many Members both as to Democratic fealty and patriotism; but I am moved at this time to ask my friend when they say they put their country above party, above which party do you put yourself?

It always seems highly appropriate from my distinguished friends from New York—who have my constant affections and my equally constant efforts whenever I can serve them—whenever stimulated by that magnificent, indescribable buoyancy of putting their country above party, it is always to descend it immediately to the depths of the Republican Party.

DEMOCRAT REFUSES TO SUPPORT SOLDIERS IN FIELD.

The then Representative from Washington was speaking on the passage of the bill to provide a bond issue to obtain funds to carry on a war, a declaration for which had already been made, to arm the soldiers, to equip the troops, and to furnish revenue for all other needed purposes; to put the means in the hands of the President to successfully wage the pending conflict, and yet my friend voted "no"; and in his fine language castigated and chastised the members of his party who saw fit to differ with him. Let me proceed:

For myself I have tired of this constant, prating cry of patriotism, which is ever invoked on the floor of this House every time there is an attempt to commit a constitutional wrong.

A constitutional wrong to borrow money to equip the soldiers! What else?

When the Nation is languishing, when there are these tremendous burdens to be borne, can we meet these new demands? It is well worthy of consideration. Is it not time for us, under these conditions, to pause and reflect where the money is to come from to meet them?

Think of that! Six hundred millions of dollars! Why, only last week, if I remember correctly, we sat in this Chamber, and, as Senators, unanimously voted appropriations aggregating, if I am correct—the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will know—fifteen billions of money.

Mr. SMOOT. Fourteen billions in two hours.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, let me say, if I may be pardoned, that $600,000,000 seemed very excessive under the policies of a Republican administration; but under the prosperity and the great advances made under a Democratic administration since then, the latter great sum was small by comparison. [Laughter.]

Mr. WATSON. I wonder if the Senator refers to 1914? However, I shall not be diverted from the path upon which I set out to follow my friend even into this delightful field of controversy.

But let me climax my reference to this remarkable utterance by this patriotic outburst:

When has it come to be a familiar truth that in order to be a Democrat a man must either rise above or sink beneath his party? I say that with the true Democrat there can be no such cry as "My country before party." With him the cry must be, "My country and my party," for without my party I would not have had my country.

What glorious patriotism! [Laughter.]

Is that the position of the Democrats of this body at this time? I make no such charge and in fact I would be the first to refute such an assertion. Is that the attitude of the Senator from Illinois at this hour? Does he now say that with every true Democrat there can be no such cry as "My country before my party"? Does he now claim that the one resounding slogan must be with every true Democrat, "My country and my party"? No one who knows him would so assert, and my sole purpose in recalling this speech is to warn the Senator that in other days he did not deem it necessary, in order to prove his patriotic purpose or vindicate his patriotic desire, to follow implicitly every wish of the President, and with swift feet execute the presidential program.

Now, Mr. President, I shall close this part of my remarks by reading a final excerpt from this truly remarkable utterance:

Gentlemen, do not forget the common people. They are not always deluded. There is a time when their patience ceases, when a just retribution comes even to those most favored by high position. Such retribution must come to those who, assuming the garb of genuine republicanism, undertake to villify and anathematize true patriots, such as are found on both sides of the House, such as is personified in the poor, and by such declamation undertake to put through here measures which only a despot or a tyrant would impose upon a suffering and patient people in an hour like this.

Tyrant! Despot! Is that following the President? Is that merging his whole being into the presidential wish and will?

The appropriation of $600,000,000 to defray the expenses of the Spanish-American War!

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Who was the tyrant?

Mr. WATSON. Ah! We had a Republican President then.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senator—not an appropriation—it was a bond issue. We insisted that the taxes should be laid upon the powerful and the rich, which, if I recall, a majority wholly refused, excepting the powerful and the rich, and providing for a bond issue instead of levying taxes, if I am not in error. I have not seen the speech for some years, but that is my present memory.

Mr. WATSON. The Senator is in error, because this was a revenue measure, with a provision in it for a bond issue.

Then the present Senator from Illinois was immediately followed by Mr. CLARK, the present Speaker of the House of Representatives. Mr. CLARK said:

If it were not for my personal affection for the gentleman from New York—

That is, Amos J. Cummings—

I would inaugurate a movement among the Democrats in this and the other end of the Capitol to read out of the Democratic Party by name every man on this floor who voted for the bond bill the other day.

Mr. President, I did not bring this up to provoke political discussion; but when my friend says that whenever the President calls we must heed his voice or else subject ourselves to the cry of "treason," I commend him to a consideration of his own record. He was talking about us over here in these references, and in response to a question that I had asked him. I voted for this war. He voted for this war and the Spanish-American, also. I have voted for every dollar of appropriation asked. The Senator voted for no appropriation sought in that war. I have voted to give the President all power requested up to this time, but here I draw the line, because I do not regard this legislation as essential to the successful prosecution of the war.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, does the Senator assert on this floor that I voted for no appropriation for the Spanish-American War?

Mr. WATSON. The Senator did not vote for the original bond issue of $600,000,000, out of which all the other appropriations came. After the bonds were issued and after the money was obtained, as a matter of course, I presume, though I have not looked it up, that the Senator may have voted for the minor appropriations that were necessary; but I know that the initial appropriation he voted against, and here is the record.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I assume that the Senator desires to present history, and not fiction. While it is some years back, and I have not been tracing the history of the legislation, as it seems the Senator did in order to have something upon which to hang some excuse for his opposition now, I recall that the first appropriation was $50,000,000, vesting discretion in President McKinley. That was the initial appropriation, carrying not only my vote but my speech. Subsequent appropriations I recall, constantly receiving my support; but it is true, as the Senator says, that when subsequently a bond issue was tendered, instead of an income tax or a tax upon wealth, I opposed the bond issue, as I had been advocating a tax upon the powerful and the rich that should at that time support the war. The Senator has done an injustice to his record in trying to leave the impression that I had voted against the appropriation for the war; and in the statement, which I am sure he made in the exuberance of his enthusiasm and the ebullition of his eloquence, that I had not voted for any appropriation, he does a great wrong to his usual sense of justice.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I would not for the world wrong my friend. If I made the statement that he voted for no appropriation, I was probably in error, though I have not examined the RECORD on that point; but I know that he voted against the bond issue, and I know that out of the bond issue came the money to pay all the other appropriations. If we had not issued the bonds and had not gotten the money, of what value or support to the country would have been his other votes? They would have been mere "leather and prunella," sounding brass and tinkling cymbal.

But I do not care to pursue this. I only know that it is very easy in the heat of debate, when men of luminous genius and brilliant imagination are speaking, and charging other people with a lack of patriotism, to have perhaps forgotten their own records.

Now, Senators, you have listened to me very patiently and kindly, and I shall not further obtrude myself upon you. I do not believe in this proposition. I do not believe that it should pass. I believe that it opens up a highway which, if we tread it, will lead finally to the overthrow of this Republic; and I want the boys who go abroad, when they come back, to come back to a republic, to come back to a nation which believes in liberty and in equality and in fraternity.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, inasmuch as I differ from the majority of my colleagues with regard to the basis for this resolution, I have determined to speak briefly upon it. To its importance I need not refer, because there can be no question that a measure designed to transfer a vast utility from the hands of its owners to those of the Government should be seriously considered, and that the best of reasons should exist for its enactment.

Mr. President, I regret that we are to consider so important a subject in conjunction with a threatened strike of the employees, or some of them, engaged in the service of the companies affected. I should have preferred that this joint resolution should have been presented without such an embarrassment, because it goes far to justify the impression that the threatened difference between employer and employee prompted the Government to take a step which, in the absence of such a condition, it would not have taken. We had some legislation in 1916 under similar circumstances. I supported the bill passed during the closing hours of the summer session of the last Congress relating to railway employees only because the majority party pledged itself to a series of acts, of which that was the first, but none of which since that time has received any consideration whatever.

Mr. President, I do not like to be placed in the position of supporting or opposing a measure under outside pressure of any sort, unless it be one of those great and sudden emergencies which war conditions sometimes produce. If, therefore, I were convinced that the joint resolution was not designed for a purpose which addresses itself to my mind as a necessary one independently of such environment, I should certainly for that reason, if for no other, withhold my vote for it. I sympathize very fully with those who have riveted attention to that circumstance and have rerferred to it as a possible stimulus for the suggestion of this proposed legislation. And it is a remarkable fact that a strike of continent-wide proportions should have been threatened by an organization alien to the interests to be affected. I know of no other instance in the history of labor troubles in the United States that furnishes a parallel to the situation. My amazement was profound when I learned after this joint resolution was introduced that the threatened labor trouble proceeded from a source almost wholly external to the class of employment of the Western Union Telegraph Co. It leaves a bad taste in the mouth to infer—and there is ground for the inference—that this condition of affairs may have been prearranged in order to force the hand of the administration and compel affirmative action by the Congress. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] asks what was the source of the threatened strike to which I am referring. If I am correctly informed, it comes from an association of telegraphers whose membership is exclusive of the employees of the Western Union Telegraph Co., which does 80 per cent of the business of the country, and exclusive of the telephones and of the companies which operate them.

It is, therefore, only because of the conviction which I have long entertained that all methods of communication, whether by the agency of the electric current or of the mail, should be entirely within the control of the Federal Government that I bring myself at this time to consider this subject upon its merits, independently of the circumstances to which I have referred. Let me say, then, that primarily I have always been in favor of the Government ownership of telegraphs and telephones. I have never been able to understand why the Government should control our mail system, why it should have entire jurisdiction over our slower and more ancient methods of communication, and at the same time be denied similar control over the newer, more rapid, and more satisfactory means of communication. I believe when the discovery by Prof. Morse of the system of telegraphy was made the Government should have taken it over, as its inventor desired. I believe that a second blunder was committed when the telephone was permitted to remain in and be developed by private enterprise.

This view, Mr. President, may be socialistic, or betray a tendency toward socialism, a much-abused word and obnoxious to the sensibilities of many Members of this Chamber. This disturbs me but little, for the settled policy of the Nation upon the adoption of the Constitution was Federal control of communication. The reasons for it were persuasive; the proposition was discussed elaborately by the framers of the Constitution; and the prime importance, to say nothing of the advantages of nationalizing the Postal System, semipublic in its character, was then determined, and happily determined, for all time. Yet the same arguments now urged against the acquisition by the Government of the telegraph and telephone, if sound, could be made with equal emphasis and equal cogency against the existing system of Federal mail control.

But the people of the United States and their Government thought otherwise when telegraphy came into existence and when the telephone was discovered, or they were indifferent about it. Hence both have been developed by private enterprise. Both have come under the control and ownership of huge corporations, capitalized by the hundreds of millions, and transacting a business equal to that which is transacted by the mail.

Mr. President, these concerns, like all other private corporations controlling and owning public utilities, have waxed strong and powerful. They have identified themselves with local and with General Government, they have taken part in the conflict of political parties, they have contributed to the corrupting influences of modern politics, and have acted as those controlling public and semipublic utilities always seem to act, possibly in self-defense, certainly through motives of self-interest. While public ownership may be as disastrous as some of the opponents of this bill seem to think, I do not believe that the evil will be greater, that its abuses will be more extensive, than they have been, and doubtless will continue to be, if permitted to remain as heretofore under private control.

Believing therefore, Mr. President, that the Government should, as a matter of course, precisely as it controls our mail system also control our facilities for other means of communication, I shall vote for the pending resolution.

I regret very much that this subject was not acted upon simultaneously with out declaration of war against Germany. If there be anything among human agencies that should be under the absolute control of the Central Government during times of war, it is control of all means of communication. In so saying, Mr. President, I do not for a moment wish to be understood as reflecting upon the manner in which the telegraph and telephone companies have conducted their business during the war. I know of no complaint which can be made against them in so far as the public business is concerned. I know of no betrayal of confidence; I know of no delay in Government business; I know of nothing which would justify any adverse criticism of their admirable management.

But, Mr. President, that is merely a detail. Fundamentally where should control of all means of communication be in times of war? It is a fact familiar to every Member of this body, a fact perhaps familiar to the whole country, that in England, in France, in all the other considerable nations of the world, the telegraph and telephone systems have been nationalized ab initio. I can not at this moment recall a single nation of any consequence, I am unable to recall any of the smaller nations, which do not own or control the systems. The very obvious reason is that the national authority must in its own interest and for its own well being supervise and operate the agencies through which information and intelligence are distributed among the people.

Mr. President, it does not follow that our taking these lines over will commit the Nation to the policies of socialism. It does not follow from an adoption of this measure that we are committing or will commit the Government to a policy that conflicts with our institutions or with the policies of the past. It by no means follows that Government acquisition of the lines of telegraph and of telephone will interfere seriously or otherwise with the business interests of the country, that the Government will become a spy upon private conversation and avail itself of its opportunities for espionage, or that a complete or any revulsion from present conditions to more disagreeable and undesirable ones will ensue.

Mr. President, if private conversations should be excluded from the knowledge of others I know of no manner in which to prevent it. Where the lines are under private control private conversations are as much subject to the eavesdropper as when they are under public control. It is a terrible thing, you say, for the Government agent to "listen in" upon a private conversation. But it is a common thing for a private agent to do so. The transfer of possession does not affect this condition, whatever else it may do. It in no manner changes the mechanical methods of communication but merely substitutes one control for another.

If this be an evil, this imagined change, because I can dignify it by no other term, it is strange that it has not manifested itself in other countries where the telegraph and the telephone have always been operated by government agencies and under government ownership.

These evils, Mr. President, are largely anticipatory ones. An old philosopher shortly before his death said that most of his troubles in life consisted of things that never happened. Most of the evils anticipated or predicted of this proposed change are evils which in my judgment will never happen. It may be, indeed, I think it is, true that private enterprise in the management of the telephone and the telegraph is more capable, more economic, more satisfactory than similar agencies under public control. I think that is true of the railway system. It is true perhaps of every well-ordered public utility. But the dangers attending and the evils which are the outgrowth of private control of things essentially public are so manifest and the tendency to evoke them so strong that it is not surprising that with this satisfactory service they are able to generate conditions which have frequently proved the wreck of parties, and as frequently provoked changes in administration.

I believe, Mr. President, thoroughly in the proposition that the Government should not only take over all the lines of telegraph and, at least, all the trunk lines of the telephone companies for the war but for all time, and operate them as the Postal System of the country has been operated since our Government was established. So believing I shall support this measure, although I shall vote for an amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] as affecting the transmission of private business, not because it is a war measure, not because it is offered at a time when industrial difficulties are suggested or threatened, but because I believe it is opportune to vest in the Government of the United States the permanent control of all the avenues and agencies of mental communication.

The system has been one-sided. I am willing to concede that these vast telephone and telegraph systems would not have been as well developed under Government management from the inception of the business as has been the case under private ownership. That, however, only indicates the greater importance of the system, because of the greater degree of its growth.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] warned us that the passage of this bill meant the establishment of bureaucracy. Mr. President, if so, I should hesitate, much as I believe in the doctrine of public ownership of all agencies of intelligence, to vote for this measure. If I thought that any legislation, however urgent the necessity for its enactment, would establish bureaucracy as we understand it in our governmental affairs, I would only vote for it as a dire alternative to defeat at the hands of Germany. But unfortunately, Mr. President, bureaucracy has been established long ago in our public affairs. We are governed by bureaus and have been so governed for the last 45 or 50 years. We will continue to be governed by bureaus, increasing in number and extended in authority until we radically change our methods of legislation and require the States to exercise their rights and discharge their duties, instead of saddling them upon the Public Treasury.

Mr. President, you can not go on Pennsylvania Avenue and throw a stone without striking half a dozen bureaucrats. Not only the streets and the buildings but the woods are full of them, and they are multiplying every day. And with bureaucracy we have red tape in great and constantly increasing abundance. If a bureau is established to-morrow, day after to-morrow it will be bound hand and foot by the winding folds of that simple little article which we call red tape. It breeds like Canada thistles, springs spontaneously from the bosom of every bureau, whatever its purpose, just as soon as it is established. The red, white, and blue is the emblem of the Republic, but red tape has become its sign manual. Many of these bureaus are distinguished for the insolence and inability of those who control them. All are noted for their expertness in the art of passing the buck and teaching their subordinates how not to do it. But the enactment of this bill will not establish another bureau, for I think, Mr. President, the transfer should be, because it is a natural transfer, directly to the agency of the Government which has charge and control of the mails.

Mr. President, I have sometimes expressed a belief in the Government ownership of railways, not from a sense of conviction of its desirability, but from a belief in its expediency as the sole alternative to conditions developed by private ownership. Under private ownership a power has been developed which neutralizes the laws of the States which sometimes ignores those of the Nation, a power the control of which by the Interstate Commerce Commission has, in my judgment, proved largely ineffective; a power which can not safely coexist with that of the General Government. The only solution of this mighty problem would seem to be the possession by the Government of these vast properties and their general operation for the benefit of the public.

Hence, Mr. President, when the railroads were taken over last winter I regarded it as an opportunity for experiment by the Government of that great problem. I hoped that it would be characterized by efficiency, promptitude, satisfactory operation; in fact, by all the best features developed under private ownership. I felt that if it became a success during the war experiment public sentiment would overwhelmingly insist upon permanent Government ownership, with proper compensation to the owners for their property. On the other hand, I felt that if public administration proved unsatisfactory, unwieldy, smothered in the folds of bureaucracy, and subjected to the curses and delays of red tape, the revulsion of public sentiment from the idea of Government ownership would be equally overwhelming.

I do not know, no man can tell, whether the present administration of the railway systems from a business and economic standpoint will be as satisfactory as their private management, but judging from the progress we have made, candor compels me to state that it has not proved the success for which I had hoped.

Yet, Mr. President, I do not regret my support of the railway bill, because the public needs essentially demanded public control. I believe and hope that if public management and public control prove unsatisfactory and overexpensive, the roads will come back to the companies after the war shall have ended, which, chastened by their experience and the experience of the Nation, will conform more nearly to their duties and requirements and be less and less prone to lapse into those practices which have hitherto made private ownership obnoxious and unpopular.

Mr. President, I presume that if the owners are required to surrender to the Government their various lines of telegraphs and telephones the number of Government employees will be largely increased. I have no doubt that the wages of the operators will also be advanced, because of the increase in the cost of living and the natural tendency of the Government to pay more for the same service than is paid by private employers. Moreover, the tendency of public employees in these days to organize into unions and join the great federation will bring about that situation. I have on various occasions, Mr. President, called attention to these tendencies, and, as best I could, I have opposed them upon this floor, particularly those which indicate a purpose to meet every advance of the cost of living by corresponding advances in wages and of salaries.

However, Mr. President, that is one of the evils of the day not confined to Government employment but observable in all of the industrial life of the Nation. The profiteer begins with the man who demands more than a reasonable wage for his day's work, and it ends with the man who makes millions in Government contracts, or through opportunities created by war conditions. These are things to be deplored, but, unfortunately, they are inseparable from war. They have existed ever since history began, and they will continue to exist so long as human nature remains unchanged.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I want to ask the Senator if he does not think it would be as just and as justifiable to fix the rate of wages as to fix the price of wheat?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think, to use the Senator's expression, it is just as justifiable to fix the price of wages as it is to fix the price of wheat, and that it is just as justifiable to fix the price of wheat as it is to fix the price of anything else.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator is right, but since I have asked the question, I should like to say that I do not believe in either one.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I was nearly through, but in view of the question of the Senator from Oklahoma let me say that I was at one time an advocate of price fixing. About the time of our declaration of war, when the cost of the necessities of life was being lifted beyond the means of the average man, when landlords, and particularly in this city, were taking advantage of our congested conditions and raising rents to an exorbitant degree, when the general supply of foodstuffs had to be conserved, not only for ourselves but for our allies, I entertained the opinion that we should have a price-fixing law, investing the Executive authority with the power, after studying the market, to place arbitrary limitations upon the cost of the necessities of life.

Mr. President, we have had something over a year's experience in that line. I do not think it has satisfied anybody. Some of us have read the experiences of other nations under similar conditions and studied legislation of simliar character at other times and in other countries. I have to some degree consulted authorities upon political economy with regard to legislation of such import. I may be mistaken, but I have reached the somewhat reluctant conclusion that there is but one way in which a nation can regulate prices and hold them down to a reasonable level in time of war, and that is by doing what Great Britain did immediately after her declaration of war, and what we should have done.

The British Government, Mr. President, immediately after the war declaration invested millions of dollars in the staples of life—in wheat, in sugar, in oil, in wool stuffs, and in other fabrics. It invested regardless of cost and accumulated vast stores of these staple commodities, which, of course, were purchased with the proceeds of taxation and bond issues. Until they were exhausted, she used these huge reservoirs in distributing for the public needs at reasonable prices the stores which she had accumulated, thus forcing down to the same level the prices of similar commodities in private hands. Of course that meant a loss to the taxpayer and a loss to the Government; but it were better, Mr. President, that the loss should thus come than that the wage earners and the salary receivers of a great nation should be exploited and oppressed as they have been for some time in the United States and who obtain little, if any, relief from price-fixing processes.

I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate in discussing this subject, which is a digression, but I think every one has noticed that, although the Government fixed the price of wheat and has recommended substitutes for it, the recommendations having always been cheerfully acceded to by the great body of the people, the substitutes immediately rose in price until they reached a point in excess of the wheat price fixed by Government regulation. This indicates, Mr. President, the operation of natural laws of trade upon articles in great demand where no restraint whatever has been placed or sought to be placed upon them. We have, therefore, the remarkable spectacle of corn and rye and barley and their products being more expensive than wheat and its products, and the consequent spectacle of farmers feeding the more precious grain to their live stock, instead of the substitutes, which are better for the purpose.

If price fixing is to be followed, it should be applied universally; otherwise it is worse than useless. If it applies only to some commodities, other commodities of similar character will inevitably advance beyond all reason and production of the price-fixed commodity will diminish if it does not cease altogether. If the policy be applied to all commodities, the play of the law of supply and demand will tempt if it does not compel the people to disregard the price limitation or refuse to buy or sell as their resources or their needs may determine.

Mr. President, I do not think it is practically possible. There is a way of meeting the extortionist, however; and I hope that this Congress will adopt it before we adjourn. I refer to the liberal taxation of these extraordinary profits wherever found. The Government by that means, by a process of recaption, as it were, can compel the profiteers, whether large or small, whether they be men who toil with their hands or with their brains, to give the unusual gain to the service of the country, thus relieving the ordinary sources of revenue from the burdens which would otherwise be placed upon them.

Mr. President, I have said more than I intended to say. Let me summarize before taking my seat by stating that I shall support this measure, because I believe that these agencies of communication should be in the hands of the Government, because I believe they never should have been in any other hands, because I believe and hope that, when the transfer is made, it will be a permanent one and continue as well after as during the war.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish very briefly to reply to that portion of the argument of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] which deals with the price charged for food products and substitutes for wheat flour. This, Mr. President, immediately involves the whole question of the veto of the Agricultural appropriation bill.

I have read the veto message of the President. The data upon which the President has formed his conclusion are so erroneous in character that I am compelled to believe that those who furnished him with the erroneous data are responsible for the veto. I can not imagine that he would formulate a conclusion upon the estimates that have been made to him unless he had relied entirely upon those who had given him the estimates.

But they are so inaccurate, Mr. President, that I feel it my duty to reply to them now. I feel that I can only answer my duty to my own constituents by a reply this afternoon. It has been suggested by some of my colleagues that I might allow this matter to go over until the Agricultural bill has been brought before us; but, Mr. President, I am opposed to going into the graveyard and digging up a body that has been interred for 40 days and then proceeding with a post-mortem examination. I shall be very brief, indeed, Mr. President, and will not take over 20 minutes' time if not interrupted.

I ask first to have printed in the RECORD, without reading, the President's veto message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The veto message (H. Doc. No. 1229) is as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I regret to return without my signature so important a measure as H. R. 9054, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919," but I feel constrained to do so because of my very earnest dissent, from the point of view of principle as well as of wise expediency, from the provision of that part of section 14 which prescribes a uniform minimum price for No. 2 northern spring wheat of $2.40 per bushel.

I dissent upon principle, because I believe that such inelastic legislative price provisions are insusceptible of being administered in a way that will be advantageous either to the producer or to the consumer, establishing, as they do, arbitrary levels which are quite independent of the normal market conditions, and because I believe that the present method of regulation by conference with all concerned has resulted in the most satisfactory manner, considering the complexity and variety of the subject matter dealt with.

It is evident that the present method of determining the price to be paid for wheat has had the most stimulating effect upon production, the estimated crop of spring wheat for this year exceeding all high records in a very remarkable and gratifying way. By an overwhelming majority of the farmers of the United States the price administratively fixed has been regarded as fair and liberal, and objections to it have come only from those sections of the country where, unfortunately, it has in recent years proved impossible to rely upon climatic conditions to produce a full crop of wheat, and where, therefore, many disappointments to the farmer have proved to be unavoidable.

Personally I do not believe that the farmers of the country depend upon the stimulation of price to do their utmost to serve the Nation and the world at this time of crisis by exerting themselves to an extraordinary degree to produce the largest and best crops possible. Their patriotic spirit in this matter has been worthy of all praise and has shown them playing a most admirable and gratifying part in the full mobilization of the resources of the country. To a very greatly increased production of wheat they have added an increased production of almost every other important grain, so that our granaries are likely to overflow, and the anxiety of the nations arrayed against Germany with regard to their food supplies has been relieved.

The administrative method of agreeing upon a fair price has this very great advantage which any element of rigidity would in large part destroy, namely, the advantage of flexibility, of rendering possible at every stage and in the view of every change of experience a readjustment which will be fair alike to producer and consumer.

A fixed minimum price of $2.40 per bushel would, it is estimated, add $2 per barrel to the price of flour; in other words, raise the price of flour from the present price of $10.50 at the mill to $12.50 at the mill, and inasmuch as we are anticipating a crop of approximately 900,000,000 bushels of wheat this increase would be equivalent to the immense sum of $387,000,000.

Such an increase of the price of wheat in the United States would force a corresponding increase in the price of Canadian wheat. The allied Governments would, of course, be obliged to make all of their purchases at the increased figure, and the whole scale of their financial operations in this country, in which the Government of the United States is directly assisting, would be thereby correspondingly enlarged. The increase would also add very materially to the cost of living, and there would inevitably ensue an increase in the wages paid in practically every industry in the country. These added financial and economic difficulties, affecting practically the whole world, can not, I assume, have been in contemplation by the Congress in passing this legislation.

WOODROW WILSON.

THE WHITE HOUSE, 12 July, 1918.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to criticize or find fault with the President of the United States because of his veto of the Agricultural bill. He is clearly within his rights under the Constitution of the United States. He has applied his judgment in the veto of $2.40 per bushel wheat in conformity with his best judgment in the premises. The information upon which he bases his judgment must of course come from outside sources. It is impossible that any one man should know more than all other men about any one subject. On the other hand, each person has some knowledge on some subject not possessed by every other man. The duties of the President are multitudinous—incomparably greater than the duties of one who represents, as I do, a wholly agricultural State. But the fact that one does so represent an agricultural State forces upon him the necessity of acquainting himself with every important condition affecting the agricultural interests. And, Mr. President, it is because I have made a special study of agricultural conditions in the past, in order that I might properly represent the one great industry of my State, that I feel it my duty to reply in part to this veto message. It is not because anything I may say will change the result. We have not a two-thirds majority in favor of the Senate amendment. The veto can not therefore be overruled. But it is due to the wheat raisers of the United States that the justice of their cause be as clearly presented as I am able to present it in the brief reply I shall make.

The President is absolutely right when he says:

> Personally I do not believe that the farmers of the country depend upon the stimulation of prices to do their utmost to serve the Nation and the world at this time of crisis by exerting themselves to an extraordinary degree to produce the largest and best crops possible. Their patriotic spirit in this matter has been worthy of all praise and has shown them playing a most admirable and gratifying part in the full mobilization of the resources of the country.

I have never rested my argument for a more just consideration of the farmer's interest on the ground that his efforts to produce sufficient grain to supply the demands of this country and our allies needed the stimulation of more inviting prices. On the contrary, the fact that, notwithstanding the farmers could realize more out of any other cereal crop than out of their wheat, they have nevertheless planted more than the average acreage into wheat demonstrates a degree of patriotism and self-sacrifice that has not been manifested to the same extent in any other line of industry. My plea has been that of justice simply. The wheat raiser is not asking favors. He is asking for simple justice. He has never asked that you fix any price for his product. All he has asked is that the price of his product be allowed to adjust itself to the demand. He presents to you the fact that you have not only, through Government manipulation and encouragement and by actual Government edict, increased the price of labor from 200 to 400 per cent, but have thereby enormously increased the cost of raising his wheat, and at the same time you have increased to the same extent the price of everything which he must purchase. And he has a right to ask you, Mr. President, why you discriminate against him only.

Why is it that he has not rights equal, at least, to the rights of your lowest-paid labor? Anyone acquainted with the farm earnings of the United States knows that the net earnings of the farmer are not one-fifth the net earnings of the unskilled labor of the country. Why, then, further discriminate against him? Why should not the heavy burden of this war be borne equally by all? Why place upon the shoulders of the grain raisers the far heavier load? Your carpenters prior to the war received about $4 per day. These same carpenters are to-day receiving $10 per day, a dollar an hour through the week and $20 per day on Sunday. In the face of such an enormous advance in his wages, why should we deem it a hardship or a wrong to him to allow the farmer to obtain to a very little extent a portion of that which would be his due by right by the everlasting law of supply and demand, which, if not interfered with, automatically equalizes all differences to a degree of equality which no price-fixing machinery could ever possibly effect.

Again says the President of the United States:

> The increase would also add very materially to the cost of living, and there would inevitably ensue an increase in the wages paid in practically every industry in the country.

But did it not occur to you, Mr. President, when in 1916 you affixed your signature to a bill which increased by 25 per cent the wages of all the employees of all the railways of the country, who were then receiving from $4.50 to $12 per day, that it thereby necessarily increased the cost of living? Did it not occur to you when the Director of Railroads made another increase in wages to all employees of railways to an even greater extent, involving an addition of something like $340,000,000, you thereby further increased the cost of living? Did anyone present to you when you added this 25 per cent to freight and passenger rates, which in some instances increased freight rates over 100 per cent, that you not only greatly increased the cost of living but that a very important proportion of this $340,000,000 was charged back to the farmer who must ship his wheat?

Under your estimate the people of the United States would be compelled to pay to the farmers $387,000,000. I can not see how it is possible for you to arrive at that conclusion. You say that the anticipated 1918 wheat crop will be 900,000,000 bushels. The increase provided in this bill above the present price fixed by the Food Commission is 20 cents a bushel. Twenty cents a bushel on 900,000,000 bushels amounts to $180,000,000, or $207,000,000 less than your estimate. Who gave you that erroneous estimate? Some one who either knew nothing about what the increase would be, or who, it seems to me, must have purposely determined to mislead you.

Again, you say:

> A fixed minimum price of $2.40 per bushel would, it is estimated, add $2 per barrel to the price of flour; in other words, raise the price from the present price of $10.50 to $12.50 at the mill.

I am wondering who could possibly have presented to you such an estimate. Certainly you could not have made the computation yourself. Let me bring this to your attention, Mr. President, and show you the gross error of such an estimate.

The increase allowed the farmer by the Agricultural bill, as it finally passed, over and above what is allowed by your Food Commission, is just 20 cents a bushel. Now, it takes 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. The increased cost of the wheat would, therefore, be 90 cents per barrel, and not $2 per barrel. Certainly you would not contend that if the miller was compelled to pay 90 cents more for the wheat that goes into a barrel of flour he would thereby be justified in charging $2 a barrel additional for his flour. Did anyone present to you the fact that under the present prices this miller is selling the very bran, the shell of the wheat, back to the farmer for $60 per ton, or $1.80 per bushel?

And again, Mr. President, did anyone call your attention to the fact that during the last year, according to the report of your Trade Commission, the increase in the miller's profits in 1917 over and above prewar profits ranged from 112 per cent to 437 per cent? Do you not think, Mr. President, that, as a matter of fact, this 90 cents more for the wheat that goes into a barrel of flour could be absorbed in these enormous profits and still leave an immense profit to the millers without charging the public one cent more per barrel, much less an additional sum of $2 per barrel?

Again, you state:

> Such an increase of the price of wheat in the United States would force a corresponding increase in the price of Canadian wheat.

Prior to the war in Europe wheat in the United States, with equal freight facilities for exporting, averaged for years about 10 cents per bushel more than like grades of Canadian wheat. I have not the exact figures, and am unable to obtain them at this time, which are being paid by the British Government for Canadian wheat. I only know that when the Food Commission fixed the price of our wheat they fixed it considerably below what the British were paying for Canadian wheat. We ought to receive more for our wheat, because our wage scale in the United States is to-day far above that of Canada.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. GORE. I am informed that the quotation in Winnipeg on June 24 for No. 1 northern spring wheat was $2.21.

Mr. McCUMBER. At Winnipeg?

Mr. GORE. At Winnipeg; yes, sir; and the price at Minneapolis fixed in the President's recent proclamation was $2.17.

Mr. McCUMBER. I note also, Mr. President, that the veto message contains an estimate of 900,000,000 bushels of wheat. I am not prepared to-day to either confirm or deny that estimate. My candid judgment is that it is far too large. I have seen no estimate made as to the spring wheat crop since the drought struck the Dakotas and Montana where the greater portion of the spring wheat is raised. I had a telegram the other day from one of the large wheat-raising counties which stated that the crop in about three-fourths of the area of the State would not be over 7 bushels per acre; and if the drought continued, there might be a total failure in that section. In the Red River Valley, I am informed, the crops are reasonably good and practically safe. I read from a letter of July 8:

Mr. Wiper wrote you the other day, and I presume he told you all about crop conditions. We still have a chance of a fair yield from the late grain, provided we get rain soon. The early grain is about gone. In fact, the cattle have already been turned on some of it. We had some hail a while back that damaged the rye considerably.

This information comes from a section of the country about 200 miles distant from the other communication which I have just read, and in a section where I have most of my own farming interests, and in which I have had a deficit for the last two years.

The latest information I have comes from Granville, in my State. It comes from a gentleman with whom I am personally acquainted, and who, I know, is not inclined to exaggerate matters. As this letter reports on all of that section of the United States, I shall read it in full:

GRANVILLE, N. DAK., July 8, 1918.

Hon. P. J. McCUMBER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Western North Dakota's wheat crop is mostly all gone, and the rye crop at the best will not be over 50 per cent, and a very poor grade, with the most favorable weather. No moisture in the ground, and the most of it is beyond relief. The hay is going to be very short.

I am reliably informed that it extends clear to Havre, Mont., and covers a wide belt. The State or National Government will have to come to the aid of 90 per cent of the farmers in procuring seed grain for 1919 if the land is to be cropped. I give you this information for your personal use and that you may be informed on conditions.

I am, very truly, yours,

C. W. HOOKWAY.

I am not presenting these letters and communications to appeal to Senators or to the President for sympathy for those in this section of the country who have already lost two previous crops; I am presenting them simply to show that the probable estimate of 900,000,000 bushels has not taken into account the late unfavorable climatic conditions which are so seriously affecting the greater portion of the spring-wheat belt.

In an address of the President of the United States delivered at the joint session of the two Houses of Congress December 4, 1917, he states:

The farmers, for example, complain with a great deal of justice that, while the regulation of food prices restricts their incomes, no restraints are placed upon the prices of most of the things they must themselves purchase; and similar inequities obtain on all sides.

The farmers of my State have had many things to contend against. But they have heretofore borne their losses with fortitude and, as a class, have never asked any favors of the Government. They have asked for justice. In striking down the market price of their product 80 cents per bushel, a great injustice was done them. In vetoing a bill which sought to turn back to them 20 cents a bushel, or just one-fourth of that which was taken from them by the edict of the Food Commission, another injustice is heaped upon them.

Mr. President, if all the people understood the real meaning and effect of this increase granted by the Agricultural bill, if they were able to compare it with the increase in the earnings of the American consumer, their sense of justice would have found voice in such an urgent protest that there would have been no veto. If the President understood this matter as those who have given the agricultural problems a life study, he never in the world would have vetoed this bill for the reasons stated. I wish to bring this matter into as clear relief as possible, so that he who runs may read.

This Agricultural bill increases the price to be paid for the 1918 wheat crop 20 cents per bushel above that which has been fixed by the Food Commission.

The Food Commission's price was 80 cents per bushel less than that fixed by the law of supply and demand. That 20 cents per bushel may measure the difference between a small profit and a certain loss to many farmers. That 20 cents a bushel, when carried into flour or bread, is so insignificant that, as a matter of fact, it will not be taken into consideration at all in the retail price of flour or the retail price of a loaf of bread.

Let us look into the sale of grain and its manufacture into flour. I shall not now discuss the uncertainty of a wheat crop, nor the number of total failures, nor even the enormous cost of labor which is necessary to produce a crop under present conditions.

Four and a half bushels of wheat make one barrel of flour, or 196 pounds. In addition to this it makes 74 pounds of middlings called shorts, or graham and bran. Therefore, about 27 per cent of the grain sold to the miller is in these middlings. The bran itself, which is the mere shell of the kernel, is to-day sold back to the farmer by the miller at about $60 per ton, and the middlings, graham, or shorts, are sold to the ultimate consumer at a higher price than the pure wheat flour.

The $2.20 per bushel fixed by the Food Commission for the 1917 crop and now carried to the 1918 crop is based upon No. 2 northern at the principal terminal points. As a matter of fact, the farmer's grades run very little No. 1, and mostly from No. 2 to No. 4. So that for his entire crop he probably would receive about $1.80 per bushel on the average at the local elevator. If the farmer, therefore, buys back the bran at $60 per ton he is paying for it at the rate of $1.80 per bushel, just about what he received for his wheat. Thus, we have the farmer—and I speak of the farmer and the dairyman as one person—selling a bushel of wheat at the nearest elevator for $1.80 and then buying back one-fifth of what he sells in weight, which is the bran—not taking into account the graham or middling—at the rate of $1.80 per bushel.

So this one-fifth of the wheat has not cost the miller one cent. It is exactly the same as though a cheese factory should buy the farmer's milk for 5 cents a quart, extract the cream and make it into butter, sell that butter for 40 cents per quart, and then take the milk, make it into cheese, sell it for 45 cents per quart, and then sell the whey back to the farmer for 5 cents a quart, just what he was paid for his cream, milk, and whey combined. And, Mr. President, this is just what the farmer is getting from this cheese-making Food Commission. He is getting the whey. The commission says to him, "Swallow it, it is good enough for a farmer."

But the Food Commission are attempting to hide behind the shadow of the ultimate consumer, this poor consumer whose hours of toil have been reduced to half those of the farmer and whose wages have been increased from 200 to 400 per cent above the pre-war wage scale. I said the commission was attempting to hide behind this shadow. But that is incorrect. There is not even a shadow to hide behind. The sunlight of truth falls straight from the zenith, shedding its illumination all around and through this false, assumed interest in the ultimate consumer.

If you, the Food Commission, wish to represent the ultimate consumer, why do you allow the charge for potatoes to increase overnight from the already extortionate price of 40 cents a peck to the criminal robbery of 80 cents per peck? If you are looking after the ultimate consumer, explain to him how it is that you allow the miller to increase his profits more than 300 per cent over prewar prices. If you are looking after the ultimate consumer, explain to him why it is that you permit the packer to increase his earnings 400 per cent above prewar earnings. If you are looking after the ultimate consumer, explain to him why you allow the flour and feed commission men to increase their earnings more than 300 per cent above prewar earnings. If it is the ultimate consumer you are looking after, tell him why the retail merchant is allowed to enormously increase his net earnings over prewar earnings. If you are trying to do justice to both the wheat producer and the wheat consumer, explain to the producer why you allow the miller to charge him for the waste products—the bran, the shell of the wheat—the same price that the miller paid him for the whole wheat. And then tell the consumer why you compel him to buy substitutes—graham flour, for instance, which is half bran—and permit the retailer to charge him for that adulterated flour a higher price than he has to pay for the pure wheat flour.

Now, let us place the farmer and this ultimate consumer face to face and allow them to present their respective cases. The farmer says to the ultimate consumer:

"Under the law of supply and demand the increased call for my wheat to supply the allies raised its price to $3 per bushel. Under the law of supply and demand calling for war supplies for the allies your labor advanced to $3 per day. Then the Government stepped in and with a Food Commission cudgel drove down the price of my wheat 80 cents per bushel and said that I should not receive even at the terminal markets more than $2.20 per bushel. At the same time that the Government drove the price of my product down it stepped in and increased your wages from $3 to $5 per day. The Government, therefore, decreased the purchasing power of my wheat 26⅔ per cent and at the same time increased the purchasing power of your day's work 66⅔ per cent. Can't you see, therefore, that you not only get the best of me nearly 100 per cent in paying with your labor for the thing which my labor produces, but, in addition, that your labor has so increased the price of everything that I must purchase with my wheat that I am compelled to pay that additional 66⅔ per cent on all my purchases?"

"How do you make that out?"

"By a very simple process of computation. In one sense there is no such thing as raw material, as nothing is fit for use until labor has been bestowed upon it. What is one man's finished product becomes the raw material for the next man. And in this sense I use the term raw material. Under ordinary conditions your labor on the average constitutes at least 65 per cent of the cost of any finished article. Therefore, an article which heretofore cost, raw material 35 cents, labor 65 cents, total $1, by reason of this increase in the cost of your labor of 66⅔ per cent, will now cost me as follows: Increase in cost of raw material, that is adding 66⅔ per cent to the 35-cent ingredient, has brought that up to 58 cents plus, and adding your 66⅔ per cent increase to the 65 per cent increased-labor ingredient, we have brought that up to $1.08, or a total of $1.66."

"But," says the ultimate consumer, "I really ought not to pay any more than I do for my flour, because I am paying so much more for everything which I must now purchase."

The farmer answers: "Then why don't you apply the economy rule where it belongs? Can't you understand that the higher price for everything you buy, except my wheat, is due in a great part to your own higher wages? Can't you understand that if the brickmaker gets double wages and the brick hauler gets double wages, and the hod carrier gets double wages and the bricklayer gets double wages, it must necessarily increase enormously the cost of the house in which you live, and the store where you buy your products, and that this means increased rentals for both your home, your office, and store buildings, and that this means higher charges for commodities sold in such buildings? Can't you see that you have simply increased the price of nearly everything which you must consume because of the increase of your labor, and everybody dealing with you is compelled to raise the price of his product so that he can still purchase your labor or the thing produced by your labor? Why do you want the farmer alone to be the goat? But, as I have always labored under adverse conditions, have always carried the heavier burden, I am willing to do so now. I am not insisting upon the $3 a bushel to which I am without question entitled, but am asking through the Agricultural bill and through the vote of American legislators that they give me partial justice, just a little element of right, and increase the price of my product 20 cents per bushel. And this, while it may change a loss to a slight profit, will be a mere bagatelle in the matter of increased cost to you."

"Labor is now receiving from $4 to $10 per day. That is an increase of from 200 to 400 per cent. Now, I want 20 cents per bushel increase to partially meet these increased earnings of labor, carrying as they do increased cost of everything I am compelled to purchase. How much will that affect your living cost? Let us see.

"You consume a barrel of flour in a year. It requires 4½ bushels of wheat to make a barrel of flour. You, therefore, consume 4½ bushels of wheat per year. With the increase of 20 cents per bushel, the increase provided in the Agricultural bill, over the price fixed by the Food Commission, your flour would cost you 90 cents per year additional. That means 7½ cents per month, one-fourth of a cent per day, 1 penny every four days. Now, Mr. Consumer, just look at this thing straight in the face. My increase in price, which is still 60 cents per bushel less than the law of supply and demand would assure me, will cost you one-fourth of a cent per day. That is the additional price you are paying for my labor. But when I hire you I must pay you an additional price of from $2 to $5 per day, which means from four hundred to two thousand times as much as you pay me.

"Why, Mr. Consumer, there is not a pig on my farm that would not unkink his tail for very shame at such a proposition. It outhogs all the hogs in Christendom. The laboring man, with his enormously increased wages, is not asking for it. The families of the country, all of whose members above 14 years of age are receiving or can receive fabulous wages, are not asking for it. The profiteers increasing their net earnings from 200 to 400 per cent are not entitled to it."

And, Mr. President, no man who will take the time to make a study of the wide difference between farm earnings and city earnings will ever ask that such a monstrous injustice should be imposed upon one-third of the population of the United States for the special benefit of the other two-thirds, whose earnings are now so great that they have decreased our efficiency at least 25 per cent at a time when it ought to have been increased at least 50 per cent.

But it has been suggested that we should base our estimates on the increased cost of a loaf of bread to the consumer rather than on the increased price of wheat, as most people buy their bread from the baker.

Well, let us follow the computation into a loaf of bread. I quote the following from a report of the Department of Agriculture made about a year ago:

> The experiments of the Office of Home Economics have to do with household methods, and in bread-making tests we have as yet had opportunity only to consider the usual flours known as "bread flours," which are probably blends. We get about 1¾ pounds of bread from a pound of flour by household methods. The Bureau of Chemistry states that commercial reports published by bakers estimate that with modern methods, which involve more or less fat and sugar, 325 pound loaves (before baking) can be obtained from a barrel of hard-wheat flour, and 300 pound loaves (before baking) from a barrel of soft-wheat flour. During baking each loaf loses about 1½ ounces in weight. These are average values for both sorts of flour, and flours vary somewhat in the amount of water which they will take up and retain.

Carrying this 20 cents per bushel into a barrel of flour would increase the cost of the barrel of flour 90 cents. Dividing this 90 cents by 300, the least number of loaves produced from a barrel of flour, we have an added cost of three-tenths of 1 cent per loaf. The average family consumes about two loaves of bread daily, so that the added cost would be about one-half of 1 cent daily. Compare this increased cost to the consumer of ½ cent per day with the increased income of the skilled and unskilled labor, of from 200 to 500 cents a day, and you begin to grasp the treatment which is being accorded to the American farmer in the veto of this little increase to which he is so justly entitled.

Mr. President, it is just these rank injustices that have driven our farmers into such a state of exasperation that they often plunge into the realm of wildest radicalism to extricate themselves from the meshes of wrongs imposed upon them. These farmers are organizing themselves, independent of all political parties, to resist such injustices and establish and maintain their just rights, and while their actions may for a time be chaotic and uncertain they will ultimately move along lines of certainty, and then woe be to that portion of our population of the great cities who have fattened on their labors or denied them equal earnings and consequent equal opportunities in the industrial and social world.

Mr. President, some day they will be heard from; their voice will be stronger even than the voice of our Nonpartisan League in the State of North Dakota, and it will be Nation wide. I am asking justice for them. I have presented their cause in this short period as lucidly and clearly as possible. They have been greatly wronged by this veto.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I wish to say that I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech which has just been delivered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I had intended to submit a few observations upon the same subject myself at this time, but have decided to defer them, at least for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the next amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 8, after the word "thereof," it is proposed to insert "except any telegraph or telephone line owned, controlled, or operated by a press bureau or press association."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment just read. [Putting the question.]

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote is being taken.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the amendment upon which we are to vote?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment just stated by the Secretary.

Mr. THOMAS. Whose amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll call has begun. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No response has been made.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN] to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HOLLIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is not present. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BAIRD] and vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). In the absence of my general pair, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], I withhold my vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore (when Mr. WOLCOTT's name was called). My colleague, the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], is absent on important business. If he were present he would vote in favor of the joint resolution, but I am not informed as to how he would vote on the amendments.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GORE (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently. I desire to say that on this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE]. If he were present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea." I withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY] on official business. He is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF]. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. WILFLEY], and vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I rise to announce the absence of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], occasioned by illness. I ask that this announcement stand for the remainder of the day.

I also wish to announce the absence of the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I am informed that were he here and voting he would vote "nay."

I also wish to announce the absence of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], occasioned by official business or family illness, I do not know which.

Mr. MYERS. My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. If present my colleague would vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GUION] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. KENDRICK. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. He being absent, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I notice the absence of my general pair, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. GERRY (after having voted in the negative). I find that my pair, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], is absent. I therefore withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 39, as follows:

YEAS—21.

Borah	Harding	Penrose	Sterling
Brandegee	Johnson, Cal.	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Fernald	Kellogg	Reed	Watson

So Mr. WATSON's amendment was rejected.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I desire to state that I was absent when the vote was taken on the first amendment I offered—to strike out the telephones. I desire to serve notice that I shall reoffer that amendment when the joint resolution comes into the Senate in order, if possible, to obtain a yea-and-nay vote on it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the joint resolution the following:

> The right and privilege of the people and the press, substantially as heretofore enjoyed, to the unrestricted use of said utilities upon fair and equitable terms, shall not be interfered with, except that the governmental business may, when deemed necessary, be given precedence over all other business, and rules may be adopted and enforced to prevent the use of said utilities for any disloyal purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. THOMAS. I call for a division.

Mr. BORAH. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, since there is to be opposition to the amendment, which I hoped would be adopted without opposition, let me briefly explain the purpose. I shall not be more than two or three minutes in this statement. I am going to state it, and that is all.

Under the provisions of the law as it now stands, any citizen has a right to go to a telegraph company and demand service. He has the same right with reference to a telephone company. He has that right because these properties are public utilities, and his rights exist under the common law, even if there were no statutes. Now, if the Government in its sovereign capacity should take over these instrumentalities, they having come into the possession of the Government itself, I am of the opinion that no private citizen would have any legal right to their use. Whatever right he had would be a mere permission. I think that we ought to preserve to the people of the country a legal right to the use of these instrumentalities, always subject to the paramount right of the Government—which is carefully preserved in the language of this amendment—to give preference to its messages, and to prevent any disloyal message whatsoever passing over the wires.

That is all I care to say. I do not care to argue the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CURTIS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] which I transfer to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], and vote "yea."

Mr. FERNALD (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair and its transfer, and vote "nay."

Mr. GERRY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as to the transfer of my pair, I vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as on the last roll call, and vote "nay."

Mr. OVERMAN (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before in regard to my general pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (when Mr. TOWNSEND's name was called). I desire the RECORD to show that my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] is absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the last roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I again announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. WALSH] and the fact that he is paired.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to make the same announcement that I made awhile ago with regard to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY]. I will ask to have this announcement stand upon all roll calls for the day.

Mr. KNOX. May I inquire if the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. KNOX. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the affirmative). Making the same announcement as before as to my pair being absent, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. He has not.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Montana to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY]; and

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES].

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 33 as follows:

YEAS—28.

Borah	Hale	Lenroot	Sherman
Brandegee	Harding	McCumber	Smith, Mich.
Curtis	Hitchcock	New	Smoot

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I reserve the right to offer the amendment again when the joint resolution comes into the Senate, because I am very sure that there has not been a complete understanding of this question.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, on line 7, I move to insert, before the word "telephone," the word "long-distance," and after the word "telephone" I move to insert the words "or any."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if I may make a suggestion to the Senator, would it not be a better term to use the words "interstate telephone" rather than "long-distance telephone"?

Mr. GORE. The reason why I made the suggestion is that I notice that the report on the telegraphs and telephones of the country classified them into long-distance, exchange, and farmer or rural telephones.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. My impression is that those are not interstate terms. A call from one city to another city in the Senator's own State would be a long-distance call.

Mr. GORE. I think so; yes, sir.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I did not know what the Senator's idea was about it.

Mr. GORE. I rather think, in view of the classification in this report, that this language will cover the matter. I may say, Mr. President, that there are four systems of telephones—the long-distance system, the toll system, the exchange system, and the farmer or rural system. It seems to me that the long-distance system is all that will ever be called into requisition by the Government; and the Secretary of War, in his statement before the House committee, said that the long-distance telephones could be segregated from the other systems and made available for Government use.

On the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I ask that the text be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 7, before the word "telephone," it is proposed to insert the word "long-distance," and after the word "telephone" it is proposed to insert the words "or any," so that if amended it will read:

Or to take possession and assume control of any telegraph, long-distance telephone, or any marine cable, or radio system—

And so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma. On that amendment the yeas and nays have been called for.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add a new section, as follows:

That in case the President shall take over any of the properties above described and shall enter into any agreement with the owners, lessees, or operators thereof, all such agreements shall contain, in so far as applicable, the same requirements, conditions, and stipulations as to liability to and exemption from taxation and the payment thereof as are prescribed in paragraph 3 of section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the operation of transportation systems while under Federal control, for the just compensation of their owners, and for other purposes," approved March 21, 1918, in respect to the taxation and payment of taxes on the part of common carriers under governmental control.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, some Senators seem to be under the impression that there will be future legislation upon this subject. The pending joint legislation is final legislation upon that point. It authorizes the President to take over the telegraph and telephone systems. It authorizes him to enter into agreements with them. There will be no occasion for future legislation.

The amendment which I have proposed requires the President to insert in these agreements the provision which was embodied in the act confirming the taking over of the railroads. That measure provided that in agreements entered into by the President with the railroads the war taxes should be paid out of the just compensation of the railroads and all other taxes should be paid out of their gross revenues and should be charged up as an item of expense. If it was wise to insert that provision in the railway act, it ought equally to be inserted in the present joint resolution.

For that reason I offer the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire again to offer the amendment which I offered a minute ago; and when it is read I want to say just two or three words about it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the joint resolution the following:

The right and privilege of the people and the press, substantially as heretofore enjoyed, to the unrestricted use of said utilities upon fair and equitable terms shall not be interfered with, except that the governmental business may, when deemed necessary, be given precedence over all other business, and rules may be adopted and enforced to prevent the use of said utilities for any disloyal purpose.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hope I can get the attention of the Senators just for a moment to this, I think, very important question. I know we are anxious to adjourn; but I hope that no Senator is going to allow his convenience for a few minutes to affect his vote on an important matter of this kind.

I am sure there is a misunderstanding as to the character of the action we are about to take. This joint resolution authorizes the taking over of these great utilities. There is no requirement of a single word of future legislation. They can be taken over to-morrow morning if this joint resolution is passed and signed to-night, and the subject matter will have passed from the control of Congress. The only possible chance we would ever have again at this question would be by an independent measure.

When we adopted the legislation touching the railroads—the only legislation that ever did really authorize the taking over of the railroads—we placed in the bill many safeguards. Among other things, we reserved certain powers to the Interstate Commerce Commission. I shall not take your time at this late hour to go into the details of that bill, but this bill as it is now drawn is simply a general authority to take over these utilities.
